Tex.—Smith v. Womack, Civ.App., 271 S.W. 209.
32 C.J. p 274 note 3.

Discretion of trial court

Whether the record presented a proper case for injunctive relief was, in the first instance, a question for the trial judge, but his judicial discretion was subject to review by the supreme court, not merely on the question of jurisdiction, but also on expediency and sound policy.—Henley v. Rockett, 8 So.2d 852, 243 Ala. 1.

Effect of abolition of action at law

The abolition by the legislature by statute of actions at law for damages for alienation of affections or criminal conversation does not strike down any other remedy, legal or equitable, such as a suit to enjoin alienation of affections.—Henley v. Rockett, supra.

Enjoining communication or visits

The injured spouse, to prevent a complete alienation of the other's affections, may invoke the restraining power of a court of equity, and enjoin defendant from communicating with or visiting such other.—Ex parte Warfield, 50 S.W. 933, 40 Tex. Cr. 413, 76 Am.S.R. 724.

28. Md.—Bank v. Bank, 23 A.2d 700, 180 Md. 254.

Reason for rule

In addition to the fact that legal and statutory remedies are already provided for, the opening of such a wide field for injunctive process, enforceable only by contempt proceedings, the difficulty if not impossibility of enforcement, and the very doubtful beneficial results to be obtained thereby warrant denial of an injunction.—Snedaker v. King, 145 N.E. 15, 111 Ohio St. 225.

sidered in themselves may be lawful.[35] The jurisdiction of the court rests on the ground of injury to property rights,[36] but the protection of the court will extend to intangible as well as tangible property which forms a part of the business,[37] and even though the element of unfair trade competition does not appear.[38] In order to authorize the issuance of an injunction to protect a business or occupation, it is essential for complainant to show an established business;[39] the mere fact that he is willing to engage in such business is not enough.[40] The basis of permissible action by the court is the probability of interference in the future; and unless the need for protection appears the injunction should not be granted.[41]

The fact that an injury to business has been done will not alone warrant the granting of injunctive relief.[42] Relief will be denied where plaintiff is threatened with no irreparable injury,[43] where defendant is guilty of no wrongful and injurious invasion of some right existing in plaintiff,[44] or where plaintiff may be fully and adequately redressed by an action at law.[45] An injunction interfering with the right of an individual to earn a livelihood will be granted only when justice can be accomplished by no other means.[46]

Lawful interference with business as a result of the economic law of competition cannot be enjoined;[47] competition can be enjoined only to preserve an exclusive privilege or advantage which the law

(2) Statutes affecting right to injunction

(1) In General

(a) Right to injunctive relief generally
(b) Breach of contract
(c) Interference with contractual relations

(a) Right to Injunctive Relief Generally

Although the courts will not restrain conduct which is within the allowable area of economic conflict, improper and unlawful acts of defendant in an industrial dispute may be enjoined in the absence of applicable statutes denying the remedy.

Since the contests involve a conflict between what are regarded as inherent and inalienable rights and the right to their protection, the development of the law in respect of labor disputes and the use of injunctive processes has become rather complex.[55] As shown infra subdivision b (2) of this section, the issuance of injunctions in cases involving industrial disputes is now largely regulated by state and federal statutes. In the absence of such statutes, however, or in cases where they have no application, it may be stated as a general rule that it is not within the province of the courts to restrain conduct which is within the allowable area of economic conflict,[56] but, if the object sought to be obtained by defendants is not a lawful labor object, the court is justified in exercising control of their acts,[57] and it is for the court to determine whether or not the labor objective is lawful.[58] A court of equity is open to employer and employee alike, since mutuality of obligation compels a mutuality of remedy,[59] but the interference of the court in labor disputes directed either against employer or employee should be exercised sparingly and with caution.[60] The tests applicable to other cases are to be applied.[61] An injunction does not issue as punishment for the past; its only legitimate end is protection for the future.[62]

The fact that an injury to business has been done will not alone warrant the granting of injunctive relief.[63] Thus the remedy will be withheld if the acts causing the injury in the course of industrial conflict are done for a justifiable purpose.[64] In the absence of strike or intimidation, or any threat of disorder, or interference with plaintiff's right to employ nonunion labor, an employer is not entitled to an injunction restraining the enforcement of union labor regulations affecting employment, working hours, and compensation,[65] and the fact that such plaintiff, when undertaking a job outside of his home city, is required to pay more for union labor than local employers under the regulations, does not render such regulations discriminatory, unreasonable, arbitrary, or oppressive so as to authorize an injunction.[66] So, in the absence of a showing of conspiracy, a labor union official will not be enjoined from fomenting discontent and discord among employees in an effort to organize them into a local union and demand recognition thereof by the employer.[67] A court is not justified in fettering

by injunction the bargaining power of workmen merely because they are organized in a union,[68] but, on the other hand, the right of employees to collective bargaining by representatives of their own choosing is a right of property which may be protected by injunction.[69] Competition for work being a lawful activity, whether the competing groups are unions or unions and individuals, a court of equity may not interfere by restraining the use of any lawful form of concerted action used in the struggle,[70] and the fact that employees suing a labor union for injunction against interference with plaintiffs' employment relations have established their own labor organization to bargain collectively with their employer does not render defendant's attempt to unionize plaintiffs improper so as to entitle plaintiffs to the injunction.[71] One labor union may not have the protection of equity against the lawful competitive activities of a rival union,[72] and a group of employees is not entitled to equitable protection from injury as a result of a true jurisdictional dispute between rival unions.[73]

Unless prevented by some valid law or by an existing contract, employers may discharge and hire employees at will, and discriminate against union men or against members of any particular union, and their conduct in so doing affords no ground for injunctive relief.[74]

The basis of permissible action by the court in labor disputes is the probability of threatened and unjustified interference with the rights of plaintiff,[75] even where the public has an interest in the outcome.[76] Acts of defendant for the purpose of inducing lawful action on the part of plaintiff's employees may be enjoined in so far as they involve improper acts,[77] such as trespass on plaintiff's prop-

Dissemination of information

(1) The right of former employees to convey truthful information of their disputes with their employer to the public is proper and legal and will not be enjoined.—Vim Electric Co. v. Retail Employees Union Local 830, 16 A.2d 798, 128 N.J.Eq. 450—Perfect Laundry Co. v. Marsh, 186 A. 470, 120 N.J.Eq. 508, reversed on other grounds 191 A. 774, 121 N.J.Eq. 588.

(2) An employer which had no dispute with its employees but which refused to enter into contract with union was not entitled to injunction to restrain union from distributing circulars advertising fact that employer's beverages were nonunion made on theory that distribution was unwarranted and therefore illegal.—E. L. Kerns Co. v. Landgraf, 16 A.2d 623, 128 N.J.Eq. 441, 131 A.L.R. 1063, reversing 17 A.2d 479, 128 N.J.Eq. 520.

(3) The court should not enjoin a labor union from presenting its side of controversy with an employer to public by means of placards or circulars, unless language thereof is clearly false and used deceitfully; and placards stating that restaurant was unfair to union were not objectionable in this respect, even though reference to law of state was perhaps erroneous. So the mere fact that statements appearing on signs and handbills carried by agents of labor union in vicinity of employer's restaurant were false and libelous did not entitle employer to restrain the agents' activity.—John R. Thompson Co. v. Delicatessen and Cafeteria Workers Union, Local 410, 8 A.2d 130, 126 N.J.Eq. 119.

erty[78] or injury thereto,[79] or malicious falsehood and deceit;[80] and the fact that a labor union's acts may have constituted a criminal offense does not preclude plaintiff from enjoining the union from interfering with its business by the commission of those acts.[81] The courts must exercise their full powers against the threatened use of force or fraud to destroy the privilege of freedom of contract.[82] So, where workmen seeking betterment of working conditions depart from the bounds of peaceful persuasion and resort to acts of violence, courts are authorized and required to enjoin acts of violence or acts which amount to physical intimidation,[83] but an injunction should not be granted because of isolated instances of violence and intimidation where there is no indication that such acts will be repeated.[84] A court has broad power to restrain acts which are of the same type or class as unlawful acts which the court has found to have been committed or whose commission in the future, unless enjoined, may fairly be anticipated from defendant's conduct in the past.[85] In the absence of statute limiting the jurisdiction of the court in such cases, a party injured in property rights by an unlawful combination interfering with the right of nonunion men or their employers to engage in interstate commerce is entitled to injunctive relief.[86] An injunction restraining a labor union and its members from

Acts of members as binding union

Acts committed by the individual defendants, pursuant to a common scheme known to many to break up plaintiff's business or unionize their shops, were held sufficient to bind defendant union, of which individual defendants were officers and members.—Altman v. Schlesinger, 198 N. Y.S. 128, 204 App.Div. 513.

interfering with property and property rights will not be granted in an action by an employer who precipitated the alleged wrongful acts of the union by his conduct in violating a contract with the union, locking out employees, and wrongfully terminating the contract.[87]

Although violence and intimidation have accompanied past picketing, a labor union and its members should not be prohibited from doing acts which could be done peacefully without picketing,[88] and they should not be enjoined from peaceable discussion away from the situs of former violence,[89] or from maintaining inoffensive observers near the employer's premises.[90] If, however, defendant union puts in motion a policy which its members deem to be an invitation or license to injure persons and property, it cannot, in equity, claim that there can be a severance of the lawful acts from the unlawful ones, and thus, by disclaiming an illegal purpose, take advantage of illegal acts.[91]

The court will not enjoin arbitration proceedings properly instituted under a collective bargaining agreement.[92]

Combinations of employers. It has been held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin the officers of a company whose workmen have struck from continuing a combination among themselves and with other employers not to hire them in order that the strikers may be forced to resume work for the company on its own terms.[93] On the other hand, it seems that a combination of employers to prevent the workmen of one of their number, who are on a strike, from obtaining any employment except from their former employer, by molesting, intimidating, or annoying other employers, who would, except for such acts, give employment to the striking employees, would constitute an unlawful conspiracy, which should be enjoined unless the more or less definite amount of damages suffered and the pecuniary responsibility of the members of the combination would relegate the parties injured to a court of law.[94] A seaman who has not sought or been refused employment is not entitled to restrain associations of shipowners from compelling all seamen desiring employment to register.[95]

(b) Breach of Contract

The breach of collective labor agreements, including agreements for a closed shop and agreements relating to seniority rights, will be enjoined under circumstances justifying the interposition of equity.

In the absence of statutes adversely affecting the right, as discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, as long as a collective labor agreement continues in force, it is the duty of the court in a proper case to enjoin any breach of it by either side.[96] Thus, where there is no adequate remedy at law and the damages are irreparable, a labor union is entitled to enjoin a threatened breach of a valid agreement made with an employer,[97] such as an agreement not to contract with other manufacturers for the manufacture of the employer's prod-

Agreement not to move factory

An employer's agreement with a workers' union not to move his factory outside the city during the life of the agreement would authorize the court to enjoin the employer from pursuing that same business at any other place, even though it might not, as contended by employer, authorize the court to require the employer to move an allegedly unprofitable business back to city after a move had been made.—Goldstein v. International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 196 A. 43, 328 Pa. 385.

ucts,[98] an agreement fixing the scale of wages to be paid,[99] or an agreement that there shall be no lockout of employees,[1] although a lockout will not be enjoined if the agreement was essentially breached by the union, or if it did not prohibit a lockout;[2] and an injunction will not lie to prevent an employer from violating a wage scale agreement which was without mutuality of obligation and remedy.[3] While it has been held that the breach of a contract to employ only members of a certain union will not be enjoined,[4] modern authorities agree that an employer may be restrained from violating the terms of such a contract when there is no intent thereby to injure the members of other unions or to contravene public interests.[5] Seniority rights given under a collective bargaining contract between employers and employees are such property rights as will be protected by injunction, according to one view,[6] particularly where the employees are not undertaking to require the employer to retain them in his service, but only to have him recognize their seniority rights during such time as they might remain in his service,[7] but it has been held that members of a labor organization are not entitled to an injunction restraining an employer from violating a contract with the organization prescribing working conditions and seniority rights of employees,[8] particularly where the contract does not require the employer to employ such members.[9] Members of one labor organization are not entitled

Proceedings before adjustment board

(1) Where machinist before labor union had requested a rehearing had no notice of union's National Railroad Adjustment Board proceedings against railroad for interpretation of employment contract as to machinist's seniority, and prior thereto machinist had invoked court's jurisdiction to restrain interference with his seniority status, machinist was not a party to the board proceedings and was entitled to maintain the injunction suit.—Watson v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 173 S.W.2d 357.

(2) Award of National Railroad Adjustment Board, entered into as result of dispute arising over interpretation of schedule of regulations for government of switch tenders by which switch tender who was not party to proceedings, and of which he received no notice, was deprived of his seniority and hence precluded from continuing work, was held violative of due process, and hence authorized injunction to restrain enforcement of decree.—Nord v. Griffin, C.C.A.Ill., 86 F.2d 481, certiorari denied 57 S.Ct. 612, 300 U.S. 673, 81 L.Ed. 879.

Circumstances not warranting relief

In action by union members for damages from breach of agreement between union and corporate employer concerning seniority rights, and to enjoin further breach, temporary injunction would not be granted where primary issue, whether plaintiffs' seniority should be determined by length of service with corporate employers absorbed by defendant employer or by length of service with defendant employer and length of membership in union, depended on interpretation of arbitration award referring to "usual rules" of seniority, which were not described or identified.—Dobkowski v. Contract for personal services

Bill by railroad freight brakeman to have court construe contracts respecting seniority rights and to enjoin running of trains manned by men without seniority rights to such runs was properly dismissed as to railroad, since mandatory injunction may not be issued to restrain breach of contract for personal services.—

to restrain an employer from depriving them of seniority rights claimed under an agreement with another labor organization to which the employer was not a party.[10] Under an agreement between a union and an employers' association which, on behalf of its members, agrees to submit disputes thereunder to an impartial chairman, the union is entitled to enforce injunctive relief granted in a common-law arbitration award by appropriate proceedings in equity.[11] A union suing as an unincorporated association for its members may have only such injunctive aid as its members could have.[12] Failure of plaintiff to invoke arbitration under a clause in the agreement providing for arbitration of questions arising in the construction of the agreement will not defeat the right to restrain a clear-cut breach of a fundamental, essential element of the contract.[13]

Breach by an employer of a contract between several employers whereby each agreed to operate his establishment on a nonunion basis will not be enjoined at the suit of other employers where the contract called for liquidated damages.[14]

An employer is entitled to restrain a trade union from carrying out a threat to submit testimony before the state labor relations board regarding unfair labor practices which allegedly occurred prior to an adjustment of a controversy between the employer and the union, where irreparable injury would result to the employer from the expense of defending itself at the hearing before the board and from injury to its business resulting from publicity attending the hearing of the charges,[15] and the filing of an answer to a complaint against the employer before the board does not constitute a waiver of his right to bring the action.[16]

(c) Interference with Contractual Relations

In the absence of statutes affecting the remedy, acts of third persons inducing the breach of contracts affecting labor will be enjoined in a proper case.

Courts of equity will, in proper cases affecting labor organizations or unions, grant protective injunctions where the relief is necessary to the continued preservation and enjoyment of an existing contract between parties having a legal right to make and live under it as against third persons who sustain no relation either to such parties thereto or to the contract itself.[17] So, where a jurisdictional dispute between two unions is involved, an employer of laborers belonging to one union is entitled to restrain officers of another union from interfering with him by coercion of a third person inducing the latter to break his contract with plaintiff;[18] and, where a labor union, because of the refusal of an employer of labor to recognize its association in a formal way, threatens strikes in the establishments of independent contractors who have engaged to do certain work for him, some of whom in consequence deliberately break their contracts, an injunction against the continuance of such acts will be awarded.[19]

Contracts of employment. In the absence of statute adversely affecting the right in the particular case, as discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, where a union or a union and others induce or seek to induce an employer, by threats of strikes, to procure the discharge of an employee in breach of a contract of employment, such employee[20] or employer[21] may be entitled to injunctive relief. So it has been frequently held that an injunction will issue on the application of an employer of labor, to prevent a combination of members or officers of a union from carrying into execution an agreement to procure his employees to quit his service in breach of their contracts of employment where the remedy at law would be inadequate,[22] regardless of whether the acts complained of constitute a criminal offense.[23] It is no justification that defendants acted without ill will, but in good faith in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution of the union prohibiting its members from working with nonunion men, the employer not being aware of, or a party to, such provisions;[24] and the fact that defendants acted on behalf of the members of a labor union of which they were officers for the purpose of enforcing a jurisdictional award by some labor board of a certain class of work to the members of such union, rather than to those of any other union, does not justify them in conspiring with others to prevent, by unlawful means, the performance of a contract by defendant.[25] However, the conduct of members of a labor union in urging employees to join such union, even though involving termination of their employment, will not be enjoined as malicious interference with the contract between employer and employee.[26] An injunction will not lie to restrain the publishers of a newspaper from advising and encouraging persons in the employment of others to violate their contract of employment.[27] Where a union has contracted with an employer to supply him with a certain number of employees, the union cannot be enjoined from terminating the services of those furnished and from furnishing others.[28] Where a contract between an employer and employees has been breached by the latter, and the situation is such that equity does not have power to compel the parties to carry out the contract, equity will not enjoin a third person from interfering with it.[29]

An injunction may be granted where the means to procure the breach of contract are mere molestation or annoyance,[30] payment of money or of transportation expenses,[31] threats of the imposition of fine,[32] abusive language and intimidation,[33] or violence or threats of violence;[34] and, where no justification is shown, it is applicable where the method employed to procure the breach of contract is persuasion.[35]

Contracts by employees not to join union; "yellow dog" contracts. Although it is now commonly provided by federal and state statutes that such contracts shall not form the basis for the granting of legal or equitable relief, in the absence of statute it was held that knowingly enticing and persuading employees, under contract with their employer not to join a union, to violate their contract in this regard was unlawful and would be restrained by injunction, where such interference if allowed to continue would ruin his business, and the damages were incapable of ascertainment at law.[36] It was held also that an injunction would be awarded to restrain officers of a union from inducing employees to break a contract, providing that the employees would not join a union, or that, if they did they would immediately withdraw from the service, the purpose of the conspiracy being to keep the employer in ignorance of the identity and number of those breaking their contracts until so many had joined that, by stopping work in a body, they could coerce

the employer and the remaining employees to make an agreement that none but union men should be employed.[37]

Contracts with union. It has been held that an employer is not entitled to an injunction against a labor union on the ground that the acts of the latter would tend to bring about a breach of his contract with another union,[38] and that an attempted persuasion of the public by a labor union not to patronize an employer's business while it employs members of a rival union, by means of fair and true statements that the conduct of the employer is socially objectionable to the union, even though the collateral result may be to make it unprofitable for the employer to go on with his contract will not be restrained as persuasion to break the contract.[39] On the other hand, it has been held that the conduct of one union in inducing another union which was under contract with the employer to join in a combination to force an employer, who did not need or desire the services of members of the first union, either to employ such members or discontinue his business may be enjoined as in furtherance of an unlawful labor objective.[40] In an action brought by the rival union, a labor union will not be enjoined from interfering with employment relations between an employer and a rival union provided it does not resort to unlawful conduct, but illegal acts will be enjoined.[41] So, in the absence of statutes affecting the right, a labor union is entitled to maintain a bill to enjoin another union which has, by solicitation, intimidation, and show of force, sought to cause an employer under contract with plaintiff to repudiate his contracts[42] and to cause members of plaintiff union to repudiate their contracts with the employer, and has induced or coerced the employer to repudiate the contract or notify plaintiff of his intention to do so, plaintiff's remedy at law in such case being inadequate. In such case, specific performance not being asked, no question of mutuality of obligation or remedy is involved, and defendants, who are strangers to the contract between plaintiff and the employer, cannot attack its execution or validity as between the parties.[43]

United States Shipping Act against discrimination by carriers by water, it has been held that, where union laborers, including longshoremen and the like, with the acquiescence of shipping companies, conspired to prevent shipment of the products of plaintiff, an employer of nonunion labor, plaintiff may maintain an injunction to compel the shipping companies and their employees to cease discrimination, as, if the discrimination continued, plaintiff would suffer irreparable damage; and the injunction should extend not only to the shipping companies but to their agents, stevedores, and the like.[45] The power of a federal court to issue injunctions in cases involving labor disputes has been limited by congress in a series of statutes which will be considered in subsequent subdivisions of this section. The power of congress to define and limit the jurisdiction of inferior federal courts by restricting the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes is discussed in Federal Courts § 4 d.

bb. The Clayton Act

The Clayton Act affects the remedy of injunction, not the substantive rights of the parties, and does not confer jurisdiction on the courts but restricts the power of the courts to act in cases in which they have already acquired jurisdiction. The act applies only to cases of disputes contemplated by it, and does not affect the power of equity to grant relief for fraud and deception pursued by a labor union to destroy an employer's rights.

The Clayton Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 52, the prohibitions of which, as shown infra subdivision b (2) (a) cc (aa) of this section, were further extended by the subsequently enacted provisions of the Norris-La Guardia Act, was intended by congress to forbid the use by the federal courts of their equity arm to prevent peaceable persuasion by employees, discharged or expectant, in the promotion of their side of a labor dispute, and to secure them against judicial restraint in obtaining or communicating information in any place where they might lawfully be. It introduced no new principle into the equity jurisprudence of those courts, but was merely declaratory of what was always the best practice.[46] The statute did not affect the rights of the parties but only the relief which could be accorded them; and it did not purport to confer jurisdiction on the courts, but rather it restricted the power of the courts to act in cases in which they had already acquired jurisdiction.[47] It did not, however, modify or limit the power and the duty of the court to restrain destruction of the employer's property and interference with, and intimidation of, his patrons and the public even though a dispute contemplated by the statute was involved.[48] A dispute is not within the statute unless it involves a controversial discussion between the parties;[49] and the act has no application to a case growing out of a dispute between employers and persons who are neither ex-employees nor seeking employment.[50] Notwithstanding the act, equity will grant relief for fraud and deception pursued by a labor union to destroy an employer's rights,[51] and injunctive relief in case of labor disturbances will not be denied because the acts complained of do not constitute public disorder or threatened violence.[52] Furthermore the act does not prohibit the granting of an injunction forbidding the use of insulting epithets.[53] The words "terms and conditions of employment" as used in the act contemplate such things as hours of labor, wages, classification of employees, sanitary and physical conditions controllable by the employer, opportunities for reasonable redress of grievances, and for bargaining respecting the conditions of employment, whether collectively, as enlightened public sentiment as well as convenience approves, or individually.[54] Within the provision prohibiting injunctions in any case growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right, property rights or interests include the right of the employees of a carrier to select representatives to confer with their employer[55] and the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property by the rendition of services and the right of an employee to money or other property exchanged or to be exchanged for his services.[56] An injunction may therefore be granted under the statute to restrain intimidation by a railroad to induce the forming of a company union to represent the employees.[57] The Clayton Act does not prevent an injunction restraining a railroad from violating the Railway Labor Act providing for the selection of representatives in labor disputes,[58] or restraining employees and their union from inducing or persuading other employees from continuing in their employment in connection with interstate commerce.[59]

cc. The Norris-La Guardia Act

(aa) In general
(bb) What constitutes a "labor dispute"
(cc) Adequacy of remedy at law
(dd) Substantial and irreparable injury to property
(ee) Resort to local peace officers
(ff) Failure to attempt settlement

(aa) In General

The Norris-La Guardia Act, which was intended to curtail drastically the equity jurisdiction of federal courts in the field of labor disputes, denies to such courts the power to grant an injunction in labor disputes where the requirements of the act have not been met, but does not forbid the granting of injunctions under the conditions set out in the act where there is fraud or violence or where unlawful acts have been threatened.

The Norris-La Guardia Act, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 101-115, considered as a whole and in its various parts, was intended to curtail drastically the equity jurisdiction of federal courts in the field of labor disputes,[60] and to take the federal courts out of the business of granting injunctions in labor disputes except where violence or fraud is present.[61] Under its terms a federal district court has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction in a labor dispute where the requirements of the act have not been met,[62] and this rule applies even though under the law of the state plaintiff has a cause of action cognizable in equity with the right to injunctive relief.[63] The legislative history of the act demonstrates that it was the purpose of congress further to extend the prohibitions of the Clayton Act respecting the exercise of jurisdiction by federal courts and to obviate the results of the judicial construction of that act;[64] and the provisions of the Norris-La Guardia Act, as far as they are applicable, displace the provisions of the Clayton Act.[65]

The Norris-La Guardia Act does not establish for employers any new substantive rights or put within the protection of the federal courts all labor disputes even though the conditions of the act are met,[66] nor was it intended to give labor unions the right to interfere by written contract with the enforcement of federal statutes.[67] On the other hand, the Norris-La Guardia Act does not forbid the granting of injunctions in all cases of labor disputes; in fact, it contemplates clearly that injunctions may be granted.[68] Thus an injunction will be granted in a labor dispute in cases involving fraud or violence where it is found that there was substantial and irreparable injury to plaintiff's property, that greater injury will follow the denial than will follow the granting of the relief, and that plaintiff is without adequate remedy at law and without adequate police protection.[69] The purpose of § 9, 29 U.S.C.A. § 109, specifying what the restraining order granted in the case shall include was not to preclude mandatory injunctions, but to forbid blanket injunctions against labor unions, and to confine the injunction to the particular acts complained of and found by the court.[70] Acts of violence and breaches of the peace in connection with labor disputes, and not the disputes themselves, are enjoinable under the act.[71]

The exceptions which have been left open to injunctive process by the Norris-La Guardia Act may not be treated lightly, but should be viewed restrainedly, as a narrow field of permissive jurisdiction.[72] So, although the act does not place any limitation on the court's authority to enjoin all unlawful acts complained of and found to exist,[73] and injunctions may be granted under the conditions set out in the act where there is fraud or violence[74] or to protect property from willful destruction,[75] an injunction will not be granted against labor unions or officers thereof because of violence in the absence of a showing that the union or officers committed such acts or authorized or ratified them after knowledge thereof.[76] Furthermore expressions of opinion, although inaccurate and even misrepresentative in character, or isolated acts apparently lacking in good faith, or accusations of unfairness against an employer, ordinarily do not constitute fraud so as to authorize an injunction under the exception in the act.[77] A claim of the union that it represented a majority of plaintiff's employees cannot be regarded as fraudulent within the meaning of the act where the employer, before filing the petition for the injunction had recognized the union as the employee's exclusive bargaining agency.[78] The fact that there has been violence in the labor dispute justifies the inference that there will be violence.[79]

To accomplish the purpose of the act, congress enumerated in § 4, 29 U.S.C.A. § 104, various types of conduct as to which jurisdiction to enjoin was taken away, covering a wide field of labor conflict activities.[80] Under the act the peaceful and orderly dissemination of information by persons interested in a labor dispute concerning terms and conditions of employment in an industry or a place of business will not be enjoined in the absence of fraud, breach of the peace, violence, or other unlawful conduct,[81] and an injunction will not be granted to restrain violations of a union's contract with employers,[82] to declare a union's contract with employers to be in full force and effect, requiring specific enforce-

Who are "persons interested" within statute

An association of colored persons and its officers seeking to have retail grocery store company adopt policy of employing negro clerks in certain of its stores were "persons interested" in a labor dispute between them and the company within meaning of Norris-La Guardia Act, notwithstanding absence of employer-employee relationship, and that association and its officers were not engaged in the same business as company, or a competing business.—New Negro Alliance v. Sanitary Grocery Co., 58 S.Ct. 703, 303 U.S. 552, 304 U.S. 542, 82 L.Ed. 1012, reversing 92 F.2d 510, 67 App.D.C. 359, certiorari granted 58 S.Ct. 270, 302 U.S. 679, 82 L.Ed. 524.

ment thereof, and ordering union officers and members not to restrain or coerce employees to join any particular labor organization,[83] or to compel defendants to refrain from attempting to force any of the employers to sign a closed shop contract.[84] The power of the court under the act to restrain boycotts is treated infra § 140 b, picketing infra § 143 b (1), and strikes infra § 147 b (1). In the enumeration of the various types of conduct as to which jurisdiction to enjoin was taken away, the act is wholly objective. It is not concerned with the purpose for which the acts are done, and makes no distinction between doing the acts in question with a legal object in view and doing them with an illegal object.[85] The court cannot enforce a decree in so far as it enjoins trade unions from the exercise of free speech, since the right to free speech in the future cannot be forfeited because of dissociated acts of past violence.[86]

The limitations of the Norris-La Guardia Act on the jurisdiction of the federal courts with respect to the issuance of an injunction in a controversy involving a labor dispute are not affected by the fact that a federal receivership is involved,[87] by the fact that defendant labor union may have breached a contract not to press for a closed shop,[88] or by the provisions of the Motor Carrier Act placing on interstate freight carriers certain duties and responsibilities toward the public.[89] The act applies even where injunctions are sought against labor unions charged with violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act,[90] and accordingly federal courts do not have jurisdiction to grant injunctions in cases growing out of labor disputes merely because alleged violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act are involved.[91] Where no labor dispute within the meaning of the statute exists, however, the act does not apply, and an injunction may be granted in a proper case irrespective of compliance with its terms.[92]

Temporary injunction. A court which has authority to decide whether a suit for injunction arises under the Norris-La Guardia Act so as to be within its jurisdiction can, by temporary injunction, preserve the business which is the subject of the litigation until a hearing can be had.[93]

(bb) What Constitutes a "Labor Dispute"

The definition of "labor dispute" in the Norris-La Guardia Act cannot be construed literally but must be read in its entirety, and the term should be broadly and liberally construed to include controversies on which the employer-employee relationship has bearing, but no others.

The term "labor dispute" as used in the Norris-La Guardia Act is defined in § 13 thereof, 29 U.S.C.A. § 113. What ordinarily would be understood by the term is greatly enlarged by the statutory definition which cannot be construed literally but which must be read in its entirety although grammatically its parts are independent.[94] The statutory declaration of policy contained in the act does not narrow the definition of a labor dispute as found therein,[95] although the general provisions of the act must be construed in conformity with the public policy thus expressed.[96] The term "labor dispute" as used in the statute must be broadly and liberally construed.[97] By the terms of the statute there may be a "labor dispute" where the disputants do not stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee,[98] and the act is intended to embrace controversies other than those between labor unions seeking to represent employees and employers, and between persons seeking employment and employers;[99] but the statutory classification, however broad, of parties and circumstances to which a "labor dispute" may relate does not expand the application of the act to include controversies on which the employer-employee relationship has no bearing.[1] In the enactment of the statute the attention of con-

Only indirect interest required

The Norris-La Guardia Act was intended to remove the barriers raised in former decisions of the supreme court of the United States which required the relationship of employer and employee in order to constitute a labor dispute and to provide that only an indirect interest was necessary in order to include a party within the meaning of a labor dispute.—Houston & North Texas Motor Freight Lines v. tended to have application to disputes over the sale of commodities.[2] To be a labor dispute under the statute, it must concern either terms or conditions of employment or representation of persons in negotiating terms or conditions of employment.[3] The act includes a case where one employer in an industry seeks an injunction against the employees of another employer in the same industry who are engaged in a labor dispute with their own employer.[4] The act does not concern itself with the background or the motives of the dispute.[5]

(cc) Adequacy of Remedy at Law

An injunction will be denied where an adequate remedy at law exists.

Under the Norris-La Guardia Act, an injunction will be denied where plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law.[6]

(dd) Substantial and Irreparable Injury to Property

An injunction will not be granted under the act in a case involving a labor dispute unless substantial and irreparable injury to plaintiff's property will follow its denial.

An injunction will not be granted under the Norris-La Guardia Act in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute unless substantial and irreparable injury to plaintiff's property will follow the failure to grant it.[7] Injury to plaintiff's business is injury to his property within the rule,[8] and so is a deprivation of the right to use or dispose of his property.[9]

(ee) Resort to Local Peace Officers

Acts of violence will not be restrained under the act unless the local peace officers have been resorted to and have failed or refused to keep the peace.

Under the Norris-La Guardia Act, acts of violence and breaches of the peace in connection with labor disputes ought not to be relieved against by injunction unless the local authorities whose duty it is to keep the peace have first been resorted to, and have either advised that they could not or would not keep the peace, or have failed to do so after advising that they could and would.[10] The protection contemplated by the statute is such protection as would enable the employer to proceed with the work,[11] or protection against injury to physical property;[12] it does not contemplate protection against losses which the exercise of the powers of the police cannot be calculated to prevent, such as loss of business with the employer's customers.[13] The provision that an injunction may be granted only where unlawful acts have been threatened and will be committed unless restrained must be construed with the remaining part of the act and held to refer specifically to the acts of violence which the authority of the executive is calculated to control.[14]

(ff) Failure to Attempt Settlement

An injunction will be denied under the Norris-La Guardia Act where plaintiff failed to make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute either by negotiation, mediation, or voluntary arbitration.

The provision of the Norris-La Guardia Act that no restraining order or injunctive relief shall be granted to any complainant who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute either by negotiation, mediation, or voluntary arbitration limits the jurisdiction of the federal courts,[15] and under it an injunction will be denied where plaintiff failed to make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute,[16] even though his conduct in that regard was correct under the National Labor Relations Act.[17] There is, however, no compulsion on plaintiff to settle the differences between the parties or to enter into any agreement, but merely to make a reasonable effort to compose differences,[18] and he is not compelled to avail himself of all three methods, but any one of them will fulfill the requirements.[19] Furthermore, where violence and threats of violence are committed, the provision has no application.[20]

dd. The National Labor Relations Act
(aa) In general
(bb) Proceedings of National Labor Relations Board

(aa) In General

The National Labor Relations Act does not give the federal courts power to enjoin in labor disputes greater than that permitted by the Norris-La Guardia Act except in certain instances, and does not give state courts power to enjoin a union from entering into a contract with an employer on the ground that such contract would violate an order of the National Labor Relations Board.

The National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 151–166, does not give the federal courts power to enjoin in labor disputes greater than that permitted by the Norris-La Guardia Act except in certain instances involving the granting of relief appropriate and incidental to proceedings in the courts concerning orders theretofore made by the National Labor Relations Board.[21] Under the provision authorizing the court to grant a restraining order on application of the board to enforce its order or grant like relief to persons aggrieved by the final orders of the board, the court has no power to grant such relief in cases involving a labor dispute until the board has filed its order;[22] and under the provision giving exclusive supervision and control to the National Labor Relations Board to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice, a state court has no power to enjoin a union from entering into a contract with an employer concerning wages and employment of employees on the ground that such contract would violate an order of the board.[23] If the National Labor Relations Board has power to act in a dispute between an employer and former employees, the federal district court will not interfere with or hamper its action by granting an injunction no matter how long delayed.[24] Relief by injunction against enforcement of the act will not be granted before proceedings under the act are begun, since no injury is done until then.[25] The mere filing of charges against an employer before the National Labor Relations Board for failure to bargain with the union selected at an election held under the act would not cause damage so as to authorize an injunction restraining the union from filing such charges pending an action to have the election declared invalid, particularly in view of the employer's right to judicial review of any order the board might make on such charges.[26] An employer's right to perform his statutory duty to contract with but one agency as his employees' representative in collective bargaining may be enforced in equity by injunction against interference with the performance thereof without a specific statutory provision to that effect.[27]

(bb) Proceedings of National Labor Relations Board

The federal district court has no jurisdiction to intervene for the sole purpose of depriving the National Labor Relations Board of power to hear and determine a case properly before it, but if the board or its agents are acting beyond the limits of their authority and thereby inflict or threaten to inflict irreparable injury to plaintiff, and plaintiff is without adequate remedy at law, equity may restrain such unlawful conduct.

Since by the terms of the National Labor Relations Act opportunity for judicial review of proceedings of the National Labor Relations Board has been provided in another tribunal, the federal district court has no jurisdiction to intervene for the sole purpose of depriving the board of power to hear and determine a case properly before it,[28] or to restrain the regional director designated by the board from ordering a consolidated hearing against an employer and another.[29] If the board or its agents are acting beyond the limits of their authority and thereby inflict, or threaten to inflict, great and irreparable injury to plaintiff, and plaintiff is without adequate remedy at law, however, equity may intervene to restrain such unlawful conduct;[30] and under the National Labor Relations Act, the federal district court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of a proceeding by a labor union to restrain the National Labor Relations Board from carrying into effect its direction that an election be held to determine the appropriate representative of the employees for collective bargaining.[31]

Courts will not enjoin the board from holding hearings where there is no claim that the statutory provisions and rules of procedure for such hearings are illegal, or that plaintiff was not accorded ample opportunity to answer the complaint, or that opportunity to introduce evidence will be denied;[32] and the board will not be enjoined from proceeding to hear and pass on a complaint where plaintiff has not exhausted the administrative remedy provided by the act, since such legal remedy is adequate.[33] To warrant an injunction, some irreparable injury resulting to, or threatened against, plaintiff must be shown,[34] but in view of the easy access to the court

provided by the act whenever there is believed to be an arbitrary exercise by the board of any of its powers, no irreparable injury will ordinarily result from the procedure authorized by the act.[35] Thus the mere expense and inconvenience of the investigation do not constitute irreparable damage,[36] and neither does the mere certification by the board of representatives selected by the employees for collective bargaining,[37] or the board's issuance of an order directing complainant to reinstate a discharged employee,[38] or the issuance of subpœnas to complainant's employees,[39] or threats of the board to enter complainant's office, inspect its records, and interview its employees,[40] or the threat of damage by imposition of fine and imprisonment for willfully resisting, preventing, impeding, or interfering with members or agents of the board.[41] That plaintiff would be held up as an object of ill will and scorn affords no ground for equitable relief in the absence of a showing that plaintiff will suffer any irreparable loss on this account.[42] So proceedings by the board will not be enjoined where counsel for the board has announced the intention of postponing further action in the controversy until after the filing of a supreme court decision in other litigation, since injury does not follow on inaction.[43] Equity jurisdiction cannot be supported by imputing to the board an intention to exercise its powers in an arbitrary or improper manner,[44] and the fear that the board's anticipated decision would precipitate a strike hindering the successful prosecution of a war in which the nation is engaged will not warrant the intervention of the court.[45] In suits to enjoin the administrative acts of the board, the rules by which the court is limited in granting injunctive relief are strictly observed.[46] Even the fact that the act is inapplicable to plaintiff furnishes no ground for injunction.[47]

In determining the relation of restrictions imposed on the jurisdiction of the court by the Norris-La Guardia Act in a suit to enjoin further proceedings before the board involving the legality of a closed shop agreement with one of two rival labor unions, the court should consider not only strictly legal rights but the attitudes and positions of the embattled unions, the situation of the employer, and the convenience, safety, and well-being of the people of the state.[48] By bringing suit to enjoin fur-

ee. The Fair Labor Standards Act

Even though no irreparable injury is shown, violations or threatened violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act will be enjoined at the suit of the Administrator of Wage and Hour Division for such a cause as would move a court of equity to protect employees.

Under the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 217, authorizing an injunction for cause shown to restrain violations of the act, equity will promptly respond to meet a violation or a threatened violation of the act,[51] but will refuse its aid where none is made to appear.[52] An employer whose employees are entitled to the benefit of wage and hour provisions of the act will be enjoined from further violations of such provisions,[53] even though no irreparable injury is shown,[54] the objective of the section of the statute authorizing such injunction being the protection of the employees.[55] The injunction should not be granted unless there is adequate cause shown therefor in accordance with applicable principles of equity,[56] that is, such a cause as would move a court of equity to protect employees against future violations or threats to violate,[57] and the usual equity rules applicable to injunctions are to be regarded.[58] Thus, under the rule that he who seeks equity must do equity, the administrator is not entitled to an injunction until and unless he performs the duties imposed on him by the act.[59] An injunction will not be employed to punish past violations of the act or to establish that violations had occurred, its function being to stop existing violations or prevent further infractions if there is reason to believe that they may occur.[60] Whether an

(1) It has been held that there is no distinction between jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief with respect to back wages and jurisdiction with respect to future wages, since the employer's obligation under the injunction should be granted depends on whether the employer in good faith was attempting to comply with the act, and on what he has done to effect compliance since he acquired knowledge of its violation,[61] and it will not be granted where the few violations that occurred after the matter was first called to defendant's attention were due solely to his ignorance, inexperience, and inability as a layman to comprehend the technicalities of the act.[62] So an injunction should not be granted against an employer where there has been a bona fide attempt to comply with the act, and where his attitude has been coöperative and the injunction would have no value in securing future compliance.[63] Nevertheless voluntary compliance is not ground for denying injunctive relief where it was not commenced until after suit was instituted where defendant in his answer and at the trial denied that the operations of his employees were subject to the act.[64] Where past violations have occurred the court may retain jurisdiction until it is satisfied that no injunctive relief will be necessary.[65]

Who may institute proceedings. Employees are not authorized under the Fair Labor Standards Act to bring an action to restrain labor union and employer from violating the provisions of the act,[66] the action being properly instituted and maintained by the Administrator of Wage and Hour Division[67] whose right to bring actions for injunctive relief is exclusive under the act.[68]

ff. The Railway Labor Act

Notwithstanding the Clayton Act and the Norris-La Guardia Act, interference with rights arising under the Railway Labor Act will be restrained in the discretion of the court.

The provisions of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 152, directing the railway to treat with authorized representatives of the employees for the purpose of negotiating labor disputes cannot be rendered nugatory by earlier and more general provisions of the Norris-La Guardia Act specifying what the restraining order granted in a case involving a labor dispute shall include.[69] So interference by a railway employer with the right of collective bargaining on the part of its employees may be restrained in an action brought by the labor organization validly certified by the National Mediation Board under the act as the bargaining representative; and such organization is also entitled to a mandatory injunction requiring the employer to recognize and treat with it as the exclusive representative of the employees under the certification of the board.[70] On application for a mandatory injunction in such case, however, the court may exercise a sound discretion, and refuse the injunction where it should not be issued,[71] as where the certification of the board was based on an unfair election.[72] The provision in the act that employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing creates a property right, interference with which may be enjoined.[73] Neither the Clayton Act nor Act to pay specified minimum wages is not discharged until payment is completed, and hence an employer's failure to pay is a continuing violation within the purview of the section authorizing injunctions to restrain violations of section relating to minimum wages.—Fleming v. Alderman, D.C.Conn., 51 F.Supp. 800.

Representation by chairman

Members of Order of Railway Conductors are entitled to appear through general chairman thereof as complainants in suit to enjoin railway company from interfering with their selection of representative and compel it to confer with representative selected on matters affecting parties' relations.—Myers v. Louisiana & A. Ry. Co., D.C.La., 7 F.Supp. 92.

the Norris-La Guardia Act apply to a situation created by a railroad company's alleged interference with the employees in selection of a representative and by the company's alleged abrogation without notice of an agreement with an association of such employees,[74] particularly where the association has invoked the jurisdiction of the National Mediation Board created by the Railway Labor Act.[75] Thus an injunction will lie at the instance of such association after the jurisdiction of the board has been invoked if it appears that the interference is beyond the protection of the board, but the court will refrain from prejudging issues which should properly be passed on in the first instance by the board.[76] The requirement of the statute that, after jurisdiction of the board has been invoked, the parties must give notice of any intended changes of pay, rules, and working conditions confers a property right which can be enforced by mandatory injunction if necessary,[77] and the parties may be restrained from abrogating an agreement or altering the rates of pay, rules, or working conditions in effect when the board assumed jurisdiction until the board has determined what organization was the true representative of the employees.[78] Violations of the statute will not be enjoined at the instance of a labor union whose only interest is that some employees of the railroad are members of a subordinate body affiliated with the union.[79]

aa. In General

In a proper case the courts may enjoin violations of a state labor law and may issue injunctions where industrial disputes are involved and a state statute authorizes the remedy or does not forbid it under the particular circumstances.

In a proper case the courts may enjoin violations of a state labor law,[80] and breach of a collective bargaining agreement between an employer and a labor organization may be enjoined under statutes so providing.[81] A statute which provides that no agreement between two or more persons concerning an act in furtherance of any trade dispute shall be deemed criminal if such act committed by one person would not be a crime and forbids issuance of any restraining order or injunction with relation thereto, and provides further that nothing therein shall be construed to authorize force or violence, does not preclude the granting of an injunction in an employer's suit to restrain an employee conducting a one-man sit-down strike because of inability of the parties to agree as to the terms of the employment; the mere fact that an employer and an employee are involved in the case does not forbid the issuance of an injunction in the absence of conditions prescribed by the statute.[82] An injunction will not be denied on the ground that the case involves a labor dispute within the meaning of a statute providing for the mediation of such disputes where the object sought to be accomplished by defendant labor union is an unlawful labor objective.[83]

bb. Acts Modeled on the Clayton Act

State statutes modeled on the federal Clayton Act are constitutional and forbid the issuance of injunctions in cases involving disputes between the parties specifically named therein relative to terms and conditions of employment, but not in other cases.

In some states anti-injunction acts modeled on the federal Clayton Act which is discussed supra subdivision b (2) (a) bb of this section have been enacted. Such statutes prohibit injunctions restraining persons from committing certain acts[84]

"The Supreme Court of the United States . . . held that the statute in question as applied by this court and manifest a legislative intention to legalize the acts mentioned,[85] so that it is error to restrain the doing of the things embraced therein.[86] The power to determine whether the acts complained of were within the terms of the statute is properly left to the courts.[87] The mere fact that acts of violence have been previously committed during a labor dispute would not of itself furnish justification for enjoining legal acts of peaceable persuasion.[88] In the absence of any specific provision in the statute to that effect, the issuance of an injunction to restrain interference with contract relations other than employment contracts is not prohibited,[89] and it is immaterial whether the acts complained of constitute a secondary boycott or whether they are simply illegal acts which justify the injunctive process to protect plaintiff's rights.[90]

Such statutes do not prohibit injunctions in all matters which affect employment,[91] but apply only in cases where employees have a dispute with their own employer relative to terms and conditions of employment,[92] or where similar questions are involved in a labor dispute between several groups of employees and employers.[93] The statutes apply only to cases between the parties specifically named therein, that is, between employers and employees, between employees, and between persons employed and persons seeking employment, and not to actions between employers and labor organizations not employed by the employer or seeking to be employed by him.[94]

(aa) In General

State statutes patterned on the federal Norris-La Guardia Act are constitutional, and are intended to place limitations on the power of courts to grant injunctions in cases involving labor disputes where the requirements of the statute have not been met, but do not forbid the granting of injunctions under the conditions set out in the statutes where there is fraud or violence or where unlawful acts have been threatened.

In a number of states, statutes patterned on the federal Norris-La Guardia Act, which is discussed supra subdivision b (2) (a) cc of this section, have been enacted. Such statutes are constitutional[95]

at least in so far as they do not attempt to abridge the jurisdiction of courts guaranteed by the Constitution.[96] The broad purpose of a statute of this character is to declare the public policy of the state with respect to controversies between employers and their employees,[97] to preserve the status quo during labor disputes,[98] to place limitations on the jurisdiction of courts to grant injunctions in such cases,[99] and to stop abuses of the injunctive process which had been employed to discourage unionization.[1] The statute permits of conditions which would have been considered intolerable under the ancient concept of what was an invasion of property rights.[2] Under its terms the state courts are without jurisdiction to grant an injunction in labor disputes where the requirements of the statute have not been met.[3] It was not designed to impair, and does not impair, the inherent power of

The portions of the statute which impose on courts a method of procedure and conditions for injunctive relief which infringe and curtail the judicial power of a constitutional court have been held unconstitutional. Thus the sections which require a finding that the public officers charged with the duty of protecting complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection and which make the issuance of a restraining or injunctive order dependent on a preliminary negotiation or voluntary arbitration are vicious, since one faced with irreparable injury by invasion of his rights is not required to seek grace or await pleasure of public officers or to negotiate or attempt to arbitrate before issuance of restraining or injunctive order, but has right to seek intervention of equity court.—Blanchard v. the court to issue injunctions, but was designed merely to regulate the procedure which must be followed to obtain the injunctive relief and to limit the scope of the relief which may be granted,[4] and interference with the conduct of plaintiff's business may be enjoined where there is sufficient compliance with the statute.[5] The essence of the act is not to take away jurisdiction, in the usual meaning of that word, from courts, but to forbid them to issue injunctions of a certain character or unless certain conditions are found to exist.[6] The statute does not deprive the court of the power to enjoin, formerly possessed by it, where a breach of any contract not contrary to public policy has been threatened or committed,[7] provided the other requisite facts are found to exist.[8] The statute does not declare to be either legal or illegal the acts against which an injunction is prohibited,[9] nor does it affect other remedies;[10] it merely denies the particular remedy of injunction in certain cases and restricts it in others.[11] The statute must be read with the rights and claims of the public and of business men in mind, as well as the rights and claims of labor unions.[12]

The restraint imposed by the statute is intended to aid working men in their efforts to reach a plane of bargaining equality with employers by making their combination extend beyond one shop, and so to raise the standard of wages and improve working conditions throughout an entire industry, and it is not intended to leave unions free by the use of these economic weapons to inflict wanton injury on fellow workers and to accomplish the building of a monopoly of labor;[13] nor was the act designed as an instrument to promote and protect strife between rival labor groups or to injure or destroy the good will and business of innocent employers against whom there was no complaint concerning wages or working conditions solely because they refused to take sides with one group as against the other.[14] Its objectives relate solely to industrial disputes.[15] The statute does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to enjoin dangerous, illegal acts which constitute disorderly conduct and breach of the peace,[16] or acts of violence or threatened violence where it was impossible to supply adequate police protection.[17] The fact that an injunction will be difficult to enforce is not controlling in determining whether it should be granted.[18] Only unlawful acts, however, may be restrained.[19]

Where no labor dispute within the meaning of the statute exists, the statute does not apply, and an injunction may be granted in a proper case irrespective of compliance with its terms.[20] Furthermore, the statute is inapplicable where a preëxisting dispute has ceased to exist, as where it has been settled by a contract lawfully executed between the employer and legal representative of a majority of the employees.[21]

The statute affects a remedy, and applies to all matters covered by it, whether or not pending in court at the time of its becoming a law,[22] and its enactment was not within the provision of a general statute that the passage or repeal of an act shall not affect any action then pending.[23] It is applicable to an action instituted prior to its enactment, notwithstanding a contention that its application would affect substantive rights.[24]

A provision exempting from the operation of the statute cases involving certain specified classes of labor disputes leaves the equity jurisdiction in such cases exactly as it was prior to the passage of the act,[25] and the courts are free to use their equitable powers in such cases.[26] A provision exempting from the operation of the statute cases involving labor disputes in disregard, breach, or violation of valid subsisting labor agreements between employers and employees' collective bargaining representatives does not permit an employer to terminate or avoid a labor dispute by refusing to recognize or bargain with his disputants and exempt himself from the operation of the statute by entering into an agreement with another association of employees.[27]

The definition of "labor disputes" in state anti-injunction statutes is generally construed broadly and liberally to include controversies on which the employer-employee relationship has bearing, and no others.

The question of what constitutes a labor dispute, even under the statutory definition thereof, admits of no generally applicable and definitive answer,[28] but is governed by the circumstances in the individual case.[29] Some decisions seem to indicate that the statute should receive a literal construction;[30] but other authority holds that in construing the statute for the purpose of determining whether a labor dispute exists, the court must be governed, not by the letter, but by the spirit of the law,[31] and is not precluded from looking at the end sought to be accomplished by defendants;[32] and, as shown supra subdivision b (2) (a) cc (bb) of this section, the latter view, rather than the former, is the one which seems to have been adopted by the federal courts in construing the federal act. The statutory declaration of policy in a labor code does not narrow the definition of a labor dispute as found therein.[33] The definition of "labor dispute" in such statutes is inclusive, not exclusive.[34] It includes all legitimate labor controversies involving all terms and conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.[35] A labor dispute may exist between an employer and a labor union, even though there is no controversy between such employer and his own employees,[36] and

Craft viewed as entity

Under statute, workers are to be considered by occupation, that they follow, and to determine whether a labor dispute is involved, question is not to be decided by conditions obtaining within the group of employees of any one firm, but unit to be reckoned with embraces all workers engaged in particular occupation, even though they have different employers, since whole craft or trade is to be viewed as one entity in so far as employees are concerned.—Strauss v. Steiner, 18 N.Y.S.2d 395, 173 Misc. 521, affirmed 18 N.Y.S.2d 75, 259 App Div. 725, appeal denied 19 N.Y.S.2d 771, 259 App. Div. 818.

In Indiana

The statute applies only to actions between employers and employees or between employees and employees and has no application where there is no labor relationship whatever between plaintiffs and defendants; and, where the suit is brought by a proper person, the jurisdiction of the court cannot be attacked on the ground that it was brought in behalf of persons with whom defendants have a labor dispute to circumvent the provisions of the statute, in the absence of evidence that plaintiffs are acting for anyone but themselves.—Muncie Building Trades Council v. Umbarger, 17 N.E.2d 828, 215 Ind. 13.

However, facts that some of salesmen had been or were members of other unions none of which was engaged in any controversy with sales-

even though the labor relations board has approved an employer's contract with a rival union.[37] It has been held, however, that an employer's refusal to abrogate a collective bargaining contract with a labor union and execute a contract proposed by a rival union did not give rise to a labor dispute within the statute.[38] The number of employees involved is of no significance; a labor dispute may exist regardless of whether the employer hires one worker or a great many;[39] but a controversy on which the employer-employee relationship has no bearing is not a labor dispute within the act.[40] Thus, although men's employer, which was being picketed by a union which desired to unionize employer's business, and that employer which sought an injunction to restrain picketing had sold its products at some prior time through an agent employing union men, did not present a labor dispute within statute.—S and W Fine Foods v. (14) Controversies involving revocation of charters of subsidiaries of labor organization by parent unions, even though the incidental effect of the revocation of the charter was the contrary view has been taken,[41] the statute has been held inapplicable in cases where the owner of a small business seeks to avoid labor disputes as defined in the act by running his business without any employees,[42] but this doctrine does not extend to a case where the business of a corporation is conducted by its stockholders,[43] or where the owner of the business was a member of an association of employers negotiating with the union.[44] The statute has been held not to apply to a nonprofit charitable corporation which operates a public hospital,[45] particularly where the hospital accepted patients from the city or state, and was, therefore, a governmental agency performing a governmental function;[46] but there is authority to the contrary.[47] Unless the objective of defendant union is a lawful one, the controversy is not a labor dispute in the sense of the statute.[48] A labor dispute is an economic dispute,

Assistance of members of owner's family

(1) It has been held that no labor dispute exists within statute where after discharging employees business was operated by owners and members of their family.—Anastasiou v. Supran, 21 N.Y.S.2d 541—Pitter v. Kaminsky, 7 N.Y.S.2d 10.

(2) The same rule has been applied where partners run their business without outside assistance except from the wife of one of them.—Botnick v. Winokur, 7 N.Y.S.2d 6.

(3) On the other hand, it has been held that, where, during the course of negotiations for renewal of labor union contract and for increase in wages to two employees, employers notified union that because of business conditions the two employees were being laid off and that business would be continued without employees except for wife of one of employers, the statute relating to issuance of injunctions in "labor disputes" was applicable, since wife took the place of at least one of employees discharged as result of a "labor dispute."—Greenberg v. but not all economic disputes are labor disputes.[49] The statute affords a remedy that was not available to common law, and those seeking the benefit of it must bring themselves clearly within its terms.[50] There being no definition of the word "employee" in the statute, it must be given its usual and ordinary meaning,[51] and a workman who temporarily suspends work in an effort to compel the employer to increase wages or improve working conditions remains an employee while making such effort, or at least until it becomes apparent that the employer has weathered the attack and has resumed business in a normal manner.[52] The statutory definition of a labor dispute as including a dispute involving employers and an association of employees presupposes the existence of an association lawfully transacting business within the state, and a union affiliated with a labor federation which had been denied a certificate of authority to do business within the state is not an association of employees within the statute.[53]

(cc) Resort to Local Peace Officers

Under the requirement of a finding that peace officers have failed or are unable to furnish protection, an injunction can be granted only when acts of violence are so manifold and recurrent that they constitute a persistent threat to future peace and order.

Under the requirement that before an injunction can be granted it must be found that the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property have failed or are unable to furnish adequate protection, the interposition of an injunction is justified only when acts of violence are so manifold and recurrent that they constitute a continuing and persistent threat to the future peace and order, with imminent injury to person or property;[54] and the record must show that acts of repeated violence have gone unpunished or undealt with because of the lethargy or inability of the police to deal therewith.[55] Sporadic acts of violence must be referred to the protection of the police authorities to the fullest extent possible, and an injunction can be granted only when such protection has proved inadequate.[56] Equity will act, however, when violence has been proved away from the scene of the dispute, and cannot be adequately dealt with by the police authorities.[57] Where plaintiffs are peacefully attempting to prevent a violation of their contractual rights by appeal to the judiciary, the public officers are unable to furnish protection, within the meaning of the statute.[58]

(dd) Attempt to Settle Dispute

Under the statutory requirements, plaintiff must, as a condition precedent to his suit, attempt to settle the dispute in one of the ways specified by the statute, provided such attempt would not be an idle ceremony.

The statutory provision denying relief to any plaintiff who has failed to make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute either by negotiation or with the aid of any available governmental machinery of mediation or voluntary arbitration requires plaintiff to make such effort as a condition to bringing his suit for injunction.[59] It does not require plaintiff to avail himself of all three methods, however, but any one of them will fulfill the requirements.[60] Furthermore, it does not require negotiation which, under the circumstances of the particular case, would be an idle and futile ceremony.[61] It is not incumbent on an employer to stand idly by, making repeated efforts to negotiate, mediate, or arbitrate while his business is being destroyed.[62]

(aa) In General

Unfair labor practices will not be enjoined where plaintiffs have not exhausted their remedies before a state labor relations board.

A court has no jurisdiction to enjoin unfair practices charged against an employer in the face of an election ordered by a state labor relations board where plaintiff employees have not exhausted their remedies before the board.[64] So, where a proceeding is pending before the board on the complaint of a union charging an employer with unfair labor practices, the relief which the board has the power to afford constitutes the employees' exclusive remedy, and they cannot maintain an action for an injunction against the alleged unfair labor practices until the board determines the proceedings pending before it,[65] and no action in equity should be entertained which would disturb the subject matter within the jurisdiction of the board.[66] Neither can the action be brought as ancillary to the proceeding pending before the board for the purpose of preserving the status quo, where the employees could secure adequate relief in the proceeding before the board, even if the employer should commit all the acts sought to be enjoined.[67] These statutes have been held not intended to apply to public nonprofit charitable hospitals, however, and not to bar a preliminary injunction to restrain a union from asserting rights against such hospitals.[68]

An employer within the purview of a state Labor Relations Act cannot obtain an injunction to restrain proceedings of a labor relations board under such act.

An employer cannot obtain an injunction to restrain the state labor relations board from hearing a complaint charging unfair labor practices,[69] even though the alleged unfair practices occurred prior to a contract entered into by a trade union and the employer adjusting the controversy,[70] and even though the employer has previously initiated legal proceedings against the union proposing the charges before the board.[71] However, where public nonprofit charitable hospitals involved in a controversy with their employees are not within the purview of the state Labor Relations Act, the labor relations board may be enjoined from proceeding against the hospitals, even though administrative remedies under the act were not exhausted.[72]

§ 139. Boycotts

Acts pursuant to an illegal agreement in restraint of trade in the nature of a boycott may be restrained.

Acts pursuant to an illegal agreement in restraint of trade in the nature of a boycott may be restrained,[73] as where newspaper publishers combine to prevent news dealers from selling a particular newspaper by threatening to refuse to sell to dealers handling such newspaper.[74] Where the acts complained of do not amount to an unlawful boycott or constitute an unreasonable restraint of trade, however, an injunction will not be granted.[75] Whether or not an injunction will be granted against boycotts arising out of industrial disputes is discussed infra §§ 140–142.

§ 140. —— Boycott of Capital

a. In general
b. Under statutes
c. Who entitled to injunction
d. Against whom injunction granted

a. In General

(1) Primary boycott
(2) Secondary boycott
(3) Combinations in nature of primary boycott

(1) Primary Boycott

A primary boycott, being lawful, will not be enjoined.

The primary boycott, as defined in Conspiracy § 12 a, is very generally held to be a lawful combination which will not be enjoined, even though the execution of its object may tend to diminish the profits of the party against whom such act is aimed.[76]

(2) Secondary Boycott

(a) Jurisdiction to restrain
(b) Particular combinations

(a) Jurisdiction to Restrain

In the absence of statutes providing otherwise, courts have power to restrain secondary boycotts where the circumstances warrant equitable intervention.

As shown infra subdivision b of this section, the jurisdiction of the courts to restrain boycotts in cases arising out of labor disputes has been drastically limited by the Norris-La Guardia Act and similar statutes. In the absence of statute, however, the jurisdiction of courts of equity to restrain boycotts is well settled;[77] but to give courts of equity jurisdiction to restrain a secondary boycott it must contain the element of coercion, by threats, intimidation or violence.[78] Jurisdiction usually is upheld on one or more of the following grounds: Injury irreparable in its nature;[79] the difficulty of ascertaining the measure of damages according to legal principles;[80] the continuing nature of the injury;[81] or the necessity for a multiplicity of suits, if plaintiff is restricted to his remedy at law.[82] Where the purpose of the boycott is unlawful, it may be enjoined in a state court.[83] The remedy by injunction is entirely independent of the remedy by action at law for damages and arises out of the conditions of the inadequacy of the latter remedy,[84] but it has been declared in some cases that equity will not enjoin a boycott unless it appears that the remedy at law is inadequate.[85] In an action to enjoin a boycott a court of equity has jurisdiction to award the damages resulting therefrom;[86] and this is so although it may be impossible to determine the total amount of plaintiff's loss and although it may be difficult to ascertain with certainty the money value of the damages that are capable of proof.[87]

As affected by criminality of acts. The fact that the acts constituting a boycott, or some of them, are punishable criminally does not divest a court of equity of jurisdiction to enjoin their commission.[88]

The enforcement of the criminal law is for the criminal court, but where the breach of the criminal law is also a violation of a property right and threatens irreparable injury the chancellor may interpose by injunction to protect property.[89] So inasmuch as it affords no reason to deny an injunction that the acts complained of are criminal, it necessarily follows that an injunction should not be refused because the acts done or threatened, although merely unlawful, may lead to the commission of other acts purely criminal.[90]

Mere apprehension of injury. While ground is present for injunctive relief whenever there is an actual or threatened injury to property, coupled with allegations of facts bringing the case within one of the recognized grounds of equitable jurisdiction,[91] the mere apprehension of some future acts of a wrongful nature, which might be injurious to plaintiffs, is not a sufficient basis for insisting on the preventive remedy of injunction.[92]

Necessity for established business. To authorize the issuance of an injunction against a boycott, complainant must show that he has an established business.[93]

Cessation of acts complained of. The fact that the acts complained of have ceased pending the filing of the bill and the hearing furnishes no ground for denying an injunction,[94] especially where there has been no disclaimer of the right to do such acts.[95] So the fact that the acts complained of have ceased after the granting of an interlocutory judgment against their continuance may not prevent the allowance of a permanent injunction against such acts.[96] Where, however, in addition to the cessation of the acts complained of, there is a failure on final hearing to make out a case sufficiently strong to move the court to exercise its extraordinary equitable powers, the bill should be dismissed.[97] It has been held that where all the acts complained of were committed prior to the commencement of the action and there is no evidence that further acts of the same character are to be anticipated, an injunction against such acts will not be granted because an injunction lies only to prevent threatened injury.[98]

Discharge by complainant of members of defendant union. The fact that one seeking relief by injunction against the acts of a union alleged to have been injurious to his business has declared war on the union by discharging all members found in his shop does not deprive him of the aid of equity.[99]

(b) Particular Combinations

aa. Coercing workmen not to enter into or continue in one's employ

aa. Coercing Workmen Not to Enter into or Continue in One's Employ

In the absence of statute, coercion of workmen not to enter into or continue in employment may be restrained.

In the absence of statutes limiting its power, see infra subdivision b of this section, a court of equity will restrain by injunction the execution of a conspiracy, or the continuance of acts commenced in furtherance thereof, to injure a person's business by the use of such means as force, violence, or intimidation to prevent those in his employ from working for him or others, not in his service but willing to accept employment from him, from doing so;[1] and a suit of the character under consideration, it has been said, cannot be successfully defended by showing a combination between complainant and other employers to depreciate the market value of defendants' labor,[2] or by showing that those committing the acts complained of were in turn subjected to rough treatment.[3]

bb. Coercing Customers or Prospective Customers to Withhold Patronage

(aa) In general

(bb) Refusal to handle materials or supplies purchased by customers

(cc) Publication of libelous matter coercive in nature

(dd) Publication as "unfair"

(aa) In General

In the absence of statute, and except where such combinations are lawful, a conspiracy to coerce plaintiff's customers into withholding their patronage from him by injury or threatened injury to their business if they fail to comply with defendants' demands may be restrained.

Although, as shown infra subdivision b of this section, the power of the courts to restrain boycotts in cases involving or arising out of labor disputes has been greatly limited by the Norris-La Guardia Act and similar state statutes, in the absence of applicable statutes it has been generally held, except where combinations of this kind are regarded as lawful,[4] that an injunction will issue to restrain the execution of a conspiracy or the continuance of acts commenced in furtherance thereof, formed for the purpose of injuring a person's business by coercing his customers or prospective customers into withholding their patronage from him, by injury or threatening injury to their business, on their failure to comply with the demands of the conspirators.[5] Physical force or violence were said not to be necessary factors in the right to the remedy,[6] although intimidation, coercion, or threats of injury to person or property were necessary to justify an injunction.[7] So injunctions were granted where the injury so inflicted or threatened was the withholding or threats of withholding of the patronage of the conspirators from customers or prospective customers,[8] or the coercion of others to withhold patronage from them,[9] or the prevention of their obtaining or keeping in their employ the labor essential to the carrying on of their business,[10] but the mere fact that union members singly or in concert voluntarily refrain from, or refuse to work for, customers of a particular employer will not warrant an injunction without proof of coercion by the union,[11] and, as shown infra subdivision a (3) of this section, acts of peaceable persuasion and argument to persuade his customers not to deal with plaintiff will not be restrained. A labor union carrying on a secondary boycott of plaintiff's business relations with its customers for the purpose of coercing plaintiff to persuade its employees to join the union, which would have rendered the employer guilty of unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act is guilty of an unlawful practice which may be enjoined.[12] Where boycotting by labor unions not representing a majority of plaintiff's employees was unlawful, the employer is entitled to an injunction restraining the unions from such activities during the pendency of proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board for investigation and certification of a bargaining agent for the employees.[13]

Use of force or violence. An injunction will be granted to restrain the members of a combination engaged in a boycott from congregating around the place of business of the person against whom the boycott is declared and using force or threats thereof to prevent his customers from dealing with him;[14] and the fact that the acts complained of constitute a public nuisance does not affect the right of an individual to an injunction where he has sustained injury different in kind and degree from that suffered by the public generally.[15]

In the absence of statutes precluding the remedy, and where such acts are not regarded as lawful, acts committed pursuant to a conspiracy to refuse to handle materials purchased by customers of a person with whom defendants have a trade dispute will be enjoined.

Although, as shown infra subdivision b of this section, the power of courts to restrain boycotts in cases involving or arising out of labor disputes has been greatly limited by the Norris-La Guardia Act and similar state statutes, in the absence of applicable statutes precluding the remedy, it has been held that acts committed in pursuance of an unlawful conspiracy between a union and its members to threaten to strike or to refuse to handle or work on materials or supplies purchased by customers of the person with whom a trade dispute exists will be enjoined;[16] and where acts of this character constitute a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act they may be enjoined in a suit brought by the United States.[17] Where it is lawful, however, for a union or its members who have a dispute with an employer to notify his customers or prospective customers that members of the union will not handle or work on material or supplies purchased from the employer, an injunction will not issue to prevent the continuance of such acts;[18] nor will an injunction issue where a union, without being inspired or moved by malice toward plaintiff, and without intimidation or threats of violence to plaintiff's customers, enacts a rule prohibiting its members from handling goods not bearing the union label and its enforcement was attempted without recourse to unlawful means.[19]

(cc) Publication of Libelous Matter Coercive in Nature

Although there is authority to the contrary, it has been held in the absence of statutes limiting the right to injunctive relief in such cases that an injunction may be granted to prevent a union or its members from publishing defamatory matter about a person with the intent to coerce others into refraining from having business relations with him.

Although as shown supra § 134 the rule is well settled that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain a mere libel or slander, it has been held, in the absence of statutes limiting the right to injunctive relief in such cases, that an injunction may be granted to prevent a union or its members from uttering or publishing slanderous or libelous matter concerning a person, where its nature and purpose is to intimidate and coerce others into refraining from having business relations with him, the view being taken that suits of this character are not suits to enjoin a libel or slander, but to enjoin acts the effect of which is to injure a person's business by coercing others, through fear of loss to themselves, to refrain from having any business relations with him, and that the issuance of an injunction to prevent such acts does not infringe constitutional guaranties.[20] On the other hand, there are decisions which maintain the contrary view and hold that the issuance of such an injunction is in violation of such guaranties,[21] and which hold further that no exception can be made to the rule by reason of the fact that defendants are financially irresponsible.[22]

(dd) Publication as "Unfair"

In the absence of statutes limiting the remedy, publication of a person as "unfair" if portending a threat to, or intimidation of, his customers may be enjoined.

A notification to customers or prospective customers that a person is "unfair" may portend a threat or intimidation, in which case it constitutes a boycott, and is unlawful, and, in the absence of statutes limiting the remedy, may be enjoined.[23] It has been held, however, that the publication of a party as "unfair" does not of itself constitute a threat or intimidation, and, in the absence of any showing that it was intended as such, such publication will not be enjoined;[24] and it has also been held that the use of the words "unfair to organized labor," if truthful, will not be enjoined, but the use of expressions which convey covert implications calculated to defame, coerce, or intimidate will be enjoined.[25] So, where the publication of plaintiff as "unfair" is untrue, deceptive, and dishonest, it will be enjoined.[26] Ordinarily false or fraudulent statements may not be disassociated from boycotting when made in connection or combination with boycott activities.[27] Where the object sought to be attained is unlawful, an injunction will be granted to restrain the "bannering" of his plant as "unfair" for the purpose of preventing the public from patronizing him;[28] and it has been held that a preliminary injunction will be issued restraining strikers from denominating an employer as "unfair to labor" and his employees as "scabs" by means of a posted placard, cards handed out to prospective employees, and communications to users of the machine manufactured by the employer and to labor unions whose members work thereon and in repair thereof.[29] It has also been held that an attempt by officers and members of a labor union to hold an employer up to public condemnation by use of unfair, and to a large degree misleading, statements of the origin and scope of the controversy between him and the union, and thereby force him to yield or take the risk of impairment and loss of the good will and patronage of customers on which his business to an appreciable extent rests, is a wrong for which a court of equity will grant redress by injunction.[30]

cc. Coercing Dealers Not to Sell Materials

In the absence of applicable statute limiting the right to injunction, acts of workmen intended to coerce dealers not to sell materials to an employer with whom the defendants have an industrial dispute may be restrained.

In the absence of a statute limiting the right to injunction in such case, it has been held that, where a combination of workmen, for the purpose of injuring a person's business, threatens strikes in the establishments of those dealing in material or products necessary to his business, in case they have any dealings with him, he will be entitled to an injunction against the continuance of such acts.[31]

(3) Combinations in Nature of Primary Boycott

Combinations in the nature of a primary boycott, when considered lawful, will not be restrained.

Members of a labor union, as long as they refrain from acts of violence, may not be enjoined from using, in aid of a justifiable strike or other lawful union activity, peaceable argument and persuasion to induce customers or other persons having, or who might have, beneficial business relations with the employer to abstain from dealing with him, although their purpose in so doing is to injure his business and constrain him to yield to their demands,[32] even though substantial loss results to the employer boycotted,[33] and it is immaterial that the employer is unable to grant the demands made on him by the union[34] or that none of the union's members was in his employ.[35] Where, however, such activity was considered unlawful, it was held that an injunction would be granted against a labor union and its officers to restrain them from persuading or inducing persons or corporations not to deal with plaintiff because it employed nonunion men or refused to recognize the union.[36]

b. Under Statutes

Although state and federal anti-injunction statutes ordinarily do not preclude the restraining of unlawful acts committed in the prosecution of a boycott arising out of a labor dispute, the power of a court to issue the injunction may depend on compliance with all statutory requirements.

It is not to be presumed, in the absence of any specific provision relating thereto, that an anti-injunction statute prohibits issuance of an injunction to restrain boycotting,[37] nor is an injunction against the use of violence prohibited by a statute legalizing combinations for peaceful persuasion.[38] Under the Norris-La Guardia Act, and state statutes, similar thereto, however, which are considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (a) cc, (b) (cc), where the requirements of the act have not been met a court has no jurisdiction in a case arising out of or involving a labor dispute to restrain a peaceful boycott[39] or a secondary boycott,[40] even though such

Lawfulness of acts
(1) Where union, in seeking to boycott constituted a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust act[41] or state law,[42] nor can the court enforce an injunctive decree entered prior to passage of the statute.[43] Where the conditions of the statute have been complied with, however, a secondary boycott involving fraud, violence, or breach of the peace may be restrained.[44] The statute does not affect the right to an injunction in a case not involving a labor dispute as defined therein.[45]

The Clayton Act, which is considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (a) bb, does not legalize the secondary boycott and nothing contained in the act prohibits a court of the United States from enjoining a secondary boycott which constitutes an interference with interstate commerce.[46]

A state statute which assumes to exempt employees from restraint by injunction when committing irreparable injury to the business of a former employer by acts of the character under consideration has been held in violation of the federal Constitution,[47] although subsequent decisions, as shown supra § 138 b (2) (b) bb, by inference reversed this view.

c. Who Entitled to Injunction

The injunction must be obtained at the suit of the party properly entitled to bring it, as determined by the applicable law.

Although the operator is not the owner of a plant, he is nevertheless entitled to an injunction to restrain a boycott which seriously interferes with the carrying on of his business;[48] and it is not material whether the corporation as such aided him in the prosecution of his suit or not.[49] So it has been held that bondholders of a mining company secured by a trust deed on its property, the value of which depends on the ability of the company to operate at a profit the mining of its coal and the meeting of its interest charges, and the payment of the principal of its indebtedness when due, have such interest in the property as entitles them to maintain a bill to enjoin a boycott executed by preventing employees of the company, or those willing to work for it, from so doing by violence or intimidation.[50] A suit to enjoin a boycott, if based on the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, cannot be maintained by an individual injured by a violation thereof, but must be brought by the federal government.[51] It has compel garment manufacturers to force their employees against their will to join union, allegedly sought to organize a customer boycott, such acts were unlawful, as respects right of manufacturers to injunctive relief against those acts.—Donnelly Garment Co. v. International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, D.C.Mo., 21 F.Supp. 807, vacated on other grounds International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union v. been held that a suit to enjoin a boycott based on the New York Business Law can be brought only by the state of New York.[52]

d. Against Whom Injunction Granted

All who aid and abet in the unlawful conspiracy to boycott may be enjoined.

The fact that some of the members of a combination, formed for an unlawful purpose, did not engage in the commission of the acts complained of constitutes no reason for denying an injunction against the latter.[53] Hence if a combination is formed by striking employees to boycott the employer by coercing other employees to join in the strike, and some of them use violence or intimidation to effect this purpose, all should be enjoined,[54] and where it is shown that there is a common united purpose on the part of the members of several unions to boycott a party, the members of each union are liable for the acts of the members of one of them done in furtherance of the boycott.[55] Also, all who aid and abet in a conspiracy, being, as shown in Conspiracy § 18, equally liable with the principals, may be enjoined.[56] Hence a trade council occupying the relation of a coöperative organization composed of delegates of several unions is liable as an accessary where by official action it gives its moral countenance and support and furnishes money to a union in aid of a strike which they seek to render effective by a boycott.[57] So a labor union whose officers as such were advisers, counselors, organizers, and supporters of the strikers, is, as well as its officers, properly a party to an order enjoining a boycott.[58] It has also been held that, where several local unions order a strike and encourage it by the payment of wages to individuals to carry it on, they are liable for all the results that can properly be traced to their original action, and they will be held chargeable with the acts of intimidation, violence, and coercion employed by the strikers, and will be enjoined from the further commission of such acts. Without proof that a national union as a body encouraged the unlawful acts of local unions in connection with a strike ordered by them, however, an injunction should not be granted against it; although its president should be enjoined when, notwithstanding his public utterances against unlawful disturbances in connection therewith, he has encouraged the same, and is, in fact, in charge of the strike, and his utterances have also been at variance with those in which he counseled peace.[59] On the other hand, where the purpose for which a combination of workmen is formed is lawful, and some of them do unlawful acts in furtherance of such purpose, the injunction should go against those alone of the combination who committed the unlawful acts.[60]

§ 141. —— Boycott of Labor

The right to labor will be protected in a proper case by injunction against wanton interference.

Even though the employee's right to labor is terminable at will, he is entitled to protection against wanton interference, although the right is not so valuable as a valid contract for continued service for a definite period;[61] and the courts will protect this right by injunction in a proper case,[62] and damages for the injury sustained may be awarded in the same suit.[63] It has been held that, in a suit in equity against the officers and members of a union for unlawfully causing the discharge of plaintiff as foreman of a granite company, if it appears that defendants instituted and continued an unlawful strike which compelled the superintendent of the company, as a last resort, to leave the question whether he should discharge plaintiff to a vote of the workmen, and, that on a majority of such workmen voting against the retention of plaintiff, he was discharged, he is entitled to relief against defendants who instituted and maintained the strike and not merely against those workmen who voted for his discharge.[64] An injunction should not be awarded, however, against one who it appears was not a member of the combination and did not commit any of the acts complained of.[65]

§ 142. —— Disciplinary Measures to Compel Withholding Patronage

In the absence of applicable statutes precluding the remedy, an injunction will lie to restrain a union using coercive methods to compel its members to withhold patronage.

Although as shown supra § 140 b, the power of courts to restrain boycotts in cases involving or arising out of labor disputes has been greatly limited by the Norris-La Guardia Act and state statutes similar to it, it has been held, in the absence of applicable statutes precluding the remedy, that an injunction will lie to restrain a union using coercive methods such as the threat of fine or expulsion to compel its members to withhold patronage.[66]

(1) Peaceful Picketing Generally

The modern view is that peaceful picketing may not be enjoined if carried on for a lawful purpose and by lawful means even though there is no dispute over conditions of employment between an employer and his employees and no strike has been called.

In some cases when essentially different views were entertained by the courts concerning the relative rights of capital and labor, it was held that even peaceful picketing was unlawful and could be enjoined,[67] but the modern view is that peaceful picketing may not be enjoined[68] if carried on for

Picketing by de facto employees

Where temporary contract was entered into between union and an unauthorized representative of employer who was ill, and subsequently the union and the employer in negotiations concerning execution of a new contract could not agree on union's demand for closed shop, and a strike was called and the employer's place of business was peacefully picketed, members of the union who worked under the temporary contract and with whom the employer negotiated in regard to the new contract were at least employees de facto of the employer, in determining whether trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant temporary injunction restraining the picketing.—San Angelo v. minative issue is whether the workmen are demanding something reasonably related to employment and to the purposes of collective bargaining.[74] The mere fact that plaintiff has sustained and will continue to sustain a loss if picketing is continued is not sufficient to entitle him to injunctive relief;[75] it must also appear that the pickets are not entitled to perform the acts complained of, or that their performance constitutes an invasion of plaintiff's rights.[76] Each case must be decided on its own facts by a balancing of those considerations which make for a sound public policy.[77]

Existence of dispute between employer and employees. The United States supreme court and other courts have held that constitutional guarantees are infringed by the policy of a state forbidding resort to peaceful persuasion through picketing merely because there is no immediate employer-employee dispute.[78] Accordingly, the modern view is that peaceful picketing will not be enjoined, even though there is no dispute over conditions of employment between an employer and his employees[79] and no strike has been called.[80] In a large number of cases decided prior to the pronouncements of the supreme court on this question, however, it was held that peaceful picketing would be enjoined in the ab-

Peaceful picketing not enjoinable

While a state, notwithstanding the federal Constitution, is not required to tolerate in all places and all circumstances even peaceful picketing by an individual, where independent peddlers who bought baked goods from bakeries and sold them to small retailers worked seven days a week and refused to join a truck drivers' union or to employ relief men, the union's peaceful and orderly picketing of the bakeries and retailers with whom the peddlers did business could not be enjoined, since such injunction would violate rights guaranteed by the federal Constitution.—Bakery and Pastry Drivers and Helpers Local 802 of International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. (2) Unlawful Purpose

Picketing for an unlawful purpose may be restrained.

Picketing for an unlawful purpose may be restrained,[84] as where the picketing is not in furtherance of a dispute with plaintiff as to wages, hours, or other conditions of employment, but is conducted solely to compel plaintiff to enter into an agreement with his competitors to fix a minimum price for certain services,[85] or where its purpose is not to advance the cause of labor, but to injure plaintiff's business by diverting his trade to defendants.[86] A similar rule has been applied where the question was considered a racial or social one, the picketing being done by colored people to compel white merchants to employ colored clerks.[87] Picketing to persuade or induce an employer to do an unlawful act, such as one condemned by statute as an unfair labor practice and contrary to the defined public policy of the state, will be enjoined;[88] and when linked with a purpose inimical to the welfare and health of an entire community, picketing will be enjoined, irrespective of what may be the right or wrong of the wage controversy in furtherance of which it is conducted.[89]

Inducing breach of contract. According to one view, picketing of the place of business of an employer by a labor union will not be enjoined on the ground that it tends, or is intended, to cause the breach of a labor contract between such employer and another labor organization, when such picketing is not otherwise unlawful.[90] On the other hand, there is authority to the effect that inducing breaches of contract by picketing an employer's place of business will be enjoined.[91]

Furtherance of unlawful strike. In the absence of statutes affecting the remedy, which are discussed infra subdivision b of this section, picketing, although peaceful, will be enjoined when it is conducted in furtherance of an unlawful strike.[92] A fortiori picketing in aid of an unlawful strike will be enjoined where the picketing is conducted by such numbers as will cause intimidation.[93]

companied by the obstruction of access to the premises picketed by any physical means is unlawful and may be enjoined,[96] although defendant's use of the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's place of business may not be prohibited even though such use interferes to some extent with that of customers entering and leaving the premises.[97] So pickets have no right to go upon premises picketed for the purpose of interfering with customers, and the continuance of such acts may be enjoined.[98]

(b) False or Fraudulent Statements

Picketing by carrying false placards or making false or fraudulent statements may be enjoined, but the mere use of loose language which does not falsify facts does not justify an injunction.

Picketing by carrying false placards or making false or fraudulent statements may be enjoined,[99] but peaceful picketing will not be enjoined because coupled with the use of loose language and undefined slogans which do not falsify facts but are part of the conventional give-and-take in economic and political controversies,[1] like "unfair"[2] or "fascist."[3] If employees, or a labor union, have a controversy with an employer, and picket the retail outlets where the product made by that employer is sold, in order to induce consumers not to purchase it, to the extent to which they merely publicize by true and fair statements, the facts of a labor dispute, they are within the protection given by the federal Constitution, and an injunction will not be granted.[4] This protection does not extend to advertising that the retailer himself is unfair to labor or to urging that the public refrain from purchasing other merchandise from him.[5]

Libelous statement

On issue whether automobile dealers who entered into contract for construction of building were entitled to injunction to restrain picketing of dealers' business, dealers had a constitutional right to contract for such construction notwithstanding dealers knew that contractor would not use union labor in construction work, and, where dealers had no control over contractor's employees, picketing by charging that dealers were unfair to organized labor was not lawful within statute authorizing picketing by peaceable and lawful means, in view of fact that such charge constituted civil libel.—Carter v. (c) Force, Violence, or Intimidation

An injunction may be granted to restrain picketing accompanied by force, violence, threats, physical assault, abusive and insulting language, coercion, or intimidation; and, where future picketing would have a coercive influence because of a background of violence in the controversy, the court may enjoin future picketing in any form, but such drastic relief may not be based on isolated acts of violence or other unlawful conduct. In a proper case a limitation may be placed on the number of pickets employed.

An injunction may be granted to restrain picketing if it is accompanied by force, violence, threats, physical assault, abusive and insulting language, coercion, or intimidation, designed to prevent workmen from working, or from continuing in, or accepting employment with, the person against whom the acts are designed to operate, or to induce his customers and the general public to withhold patronage from him.[6] This is so, even though the parties to the conspiracy are liable to a criminal prosecution,[7] and also even though workmen against whom the acts are directed are not bound by contract to enter into or continue in the employ of the party whose property is picketed.[8] Such relief presupposes acts designed to create a nuisance and calculated to work irreparable injury.[9] The commission of such acts will be enjoined as irreparable interference,[10] and in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits.[11] The fact that pickets are serving under appointment and instructions from their union adds nothing to their rights and privileges as affecting third persons.[12] Those engaged in doing duty as pickets can go no further than peaceable persuasion and the offering of inducements not to work;[13] and those whom they seek to persuade cannot be compelled against their will to listen to persuasion.[14] However, an injunction against picketing should not be awarded where there is no evidence that picketing is threatened.[15] An injunction restraining picketing is justified only by the violence that induced it, and only as long as it counteracted a continuing intimidation.[16]

Even though acts of actual physical assault and damage were rare, an injunction may be warranted by the use of vile and abusive language and threats of violence[17] or menacing and insulting gestures or attitude.[18] So it has been held that conduct of pickets shouting in unison in a loud and boisterous manner and disturbing the peace and quiet of the neighborhood[19] and other acts invading plaintiffs' right to peace, quiet, and peaceful enjoyment of their properties[20] may be enjoined. Intimidation by persons other than defendants, however, will not entitle plaintiff to relief in the absence of a conspiracy or ratification of the acts by defendant.[21]

As affected by numbers. In the absence of statute affecting the remedy, since the mere number of the pickets may in itself constitute intimidation, although no acts of violence are committed, where large numbers of pickets are so disposed as to constitute a show of force or an act of intimidation, an injunction may be granted;[22] and a limitation may be placed on the number of pickets using the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's place of business, and the manner of its use, so as to prevent intimidation of, or undue interference with, its use by plaintiff's customers.[23]

eting would have a coercive influence because of a background of violence in the controversy, the court may enjoin future picketing in any form,[24] and is not limited to imposition of a restraining order against violent and unlawful conduct.[25] This rule is particularly applicable where violent picketing was continued in defiance of a previous injunction;[26] in such case whether defendant should be given another chance to picket peacefully is for the discretion of the trial court.[27] However, an injunction prohibiting all picketing may not be based on isolated acts of violence or other unlawful conduct,[28] and, where picketing has been generally lawful, although accompanied by infrequent illegal acts not of a serious character, only the unlawful conduct will be enjoined.[29] To enjoin all picketing it must be found that violence has given the picketing a coercive effect whereby it would operate destructively as a force and intimidation.[30] In determining the propriety of an injunction prohibiting all picketing, no logical distinction may be drawn between picketing enmeshed with actual violence and picketing carried on with threatened violence and physical intimidation.[31] Where the owner of premises picketed offers in open court to furnish to the union to which the strikers belong the names of those working for him, and states that he has no objection to one picket addressing them in a peaceable manner, a temporary injunction restraining all picketing will be modified so as to permit an acceptance of this offer.[32]

b. Effect of Statutory Regulation of Right

(1) Norris-La Guardia Act and state statutes similar thereto

(2) Clayton Act and state statutes similar thereto

(3) Other statutes

(1) Norris-La Guardia Act and State Statutes Similar Thereto

Under the Norris-La Guardia Act and state statutes similar thereto, picketing not involving fraud or violence cannot be enjoined in cases arising out of labor disputes, and no picketing will be enjoined in such cases without plaintiff's compliance with the statutory requirements. The statutes do not affect the power of the court to restrain acts of fraud or violence in cases involving labor disputes where the statutes have been fully complied with, however; and do not affect the power of the court to enjoin wrongful picketing in cases not arising out of or involving labor disputes even though there has been no compliance with the statutory requirements.

The federal Norris-La Guardia Act, which is considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (a) cc, is intended to limit and circumvent the power of federal courts of equity to enjoin the acts of labor organizations in furtherance of the right of peaceful picketing.[33] The provisions of the statute that no court shall have jurisdiction in a labor dispute to restrain any persons from giving publicity to the existence of, or the facts involved in, any labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence, or from assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute, do not make the lawfulness of the act the test of whether an injunction may be granted,[34] and the advertising of a labor dispute by picketing not involving fraud or violence cannot be enjoined by a federal district court[35] irrespective of whether it may be mass picketing and as such illegal under the state law.[36] So an injunction will not be granted to restrain peaceful picketing of an employer's plant and of the employer's customers in order to obtain a closed shop[37] or to restrain pickets from carrying misrepresentative but not fraudulent placards stating that the employer was unfair to organized labor,[38] it being held that such a statement, even if untrue, does not involve fraud within the meaning of the statute.[39] The act is not intended to deprive the courts of jurisdiction to restrain, if necessary, picketing of a coercive, intimidating character, however,[40] and where all the requirements of the statute have been met, picketing accompanied by violence may be restrained;[41] but the courts are without jurisdiction to enjoin picketing in labor disputes where the requirements of the statute have not been met.[42] The requirement that it must be shown that public officers required to protect complainant's property were unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection is satisfied where it is shown that it was well known by the city and county authorities that a strike existed, no effort was made by them to stop it, and no authority would be exercised until it was shown that banners carried by pickets contained statements which were untrue and damaging to complainant.[43] A union and other defendants enjoined from unjustifiable picketing will not be enjoined from spending any sum of money in the possession of the union where the sum shown to be in the union's possession was not in excess of the amount necessary for its usual and ordinary operations.[44] Unlawful picketing in a case not involving

That one union continued to picket employer's place of business after a majority of employees had chosen another union as their bargaining agency did not give district court jurisdiction to enjoin picketing, in absence of making complete findings required by Norris-La Guardia Act on ground that picketing was unlawful as an interference with the vindicable right of employees to self-organization and collective bargaining and as an attempt to compel employer to commit an unfair labor practice.—Fur Workers Union, Local No. 72 v. Fur Workers Union, No. 21238, 105 F.2d 1, 70 App.D.C. 122, certiorari granted Fur Workers Union No. 21238 v. Hardship

Where the controversy involved in a suit to enjoin picketing was a labor dispute which only the National Labor Relations Board could end by certification in the first instance, and no injunction could issue in absence of findings required by the Norris-La Guardia Act, the court was required to enforce the plain intent of the act without regard to hardship on the employer.—Fur Workers Union, Local No. 72 v. Under state statutes modeled on the federal Norris-La Guardia Act, picketing not involving fraud or violence cannot be enjoined in cases arising out of labor disputes,[46] and no picketing will be enjoined in such cases without plaintiff's compliance with the statutory requirements,[47] or simply on the theory that the prohibition of unlawful acts does no harm to any one.[48] Where all the requirements of the statute have been met, however, wrongful and oppressive picketing[49] and violence[50] may be enjoined; and when necessary the court may authorize a prohibition of all picketing in enjoining violence in a labor dispute,[51] but in the specified classes of labor disputes.[57]

(2) Clayton Act and State Statutes Similar Thereto

Under the Clayton Act and state statutes similar thereto, peaceful picketing of an employer against whom a lawful strike is in operation cannot be restrained, but an injunction may be granted to restrain picketing which is not peaceful or peaceful picketing in furtherance of an unlawful strike.

Under the Clayton Act, which is considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (a) bb, the federal court would not grant an injunction to prevent peaceful picketing and efforts made by persuasion by striking workmen to prevent others from working for complainant, against whom a lawful strike is in operation,[58] but the rule was inapplicable where physical force or intimidation of any sort, or abuse, or duress, or any threat of physical force was employed.[59] Where there was no dispute between plaintiff and his employees, and no strike, an injunction against peaceful picketing by a labor union did not violate the act,[60] and, where a manufacturing plant was successfully operating at full capacity, with more men employed than when a strike had been called over seven months previously, and the strike had become a dead issue, the continued picketing of the plant became a mere annoyance and nuisance which could be restrained.[61] The Clayton Act did not affect the operation of the rule, stated supra subdivision a (2) of this section, that peaceful picketing in furtherance of an unlawful strike may be enjoined,[62] or the rule, stated supra subdivision a (3) (c) of this section, authorizing restraint on picketing in such numbers as constitutes an act of intimidation.[63] A fortiori picketing in aid of an unlawful strike could be enjoined under the statute where the picketing was conducted in such numbers as would cause intimidation.[64]

Under state statutes similar to the Clayton Act, which are treated generally supra § 138 b (2) (b) bb, it has been held that the courts will not restrain peaceable picketing[65] or picketing which is not unlawful,[66] although injunctive relief may be granted to restrain picketing which is not peaceable in its nature,[67] or where the picketing is in furtherance of an unlawful purpose.[68] So statutes of this nature do not affect the operation of the rule, stated supra subdivision a (2) of this section, that peaceful picketing in furtherance of an unlawful strike may be enjoined.[69] The statute does not forbid an injunction to restrain picketing of the place of business of a customer of the employer against whom a strike is directed,[70] or to restrain picketing in a case not involving a dispute between employer and employees.[71] In determining whether acts complained of may be restrained, each case must be decided on its own particular facts and circumstances.[72]

(3) Other Statutes

Various other statutes have been held not to preclude or authorize an injunction against picketing under the circumstances of the particular cases in which the statutes were applied.

An injunction against picketing of a violent character is not forbidden by a statute which prohibits the granting of an injunction against soliciting others by "peaceful or lawful means" to cease patronizing a party concerning terms or conditions of employment.[73] A statute, providing that no combination between two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of any trade dispute between employers and employees shall be deemed criminal, nor shall those engaged therein be indictable or otherwise punishable for the crime of conspiracy, if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime, nor shall any restraining order or injunction be issued with relation thereto, provided nothing in the act shall be construed to authorize force or violence or threats thereof, does not prohibit an injunction against acts which have the effect of intimidating plaintiff's customers resulting in the withdrawal of their patronage.[74] The operation of the rule, stated supra subdivision a (2) of this section, that peaceful picketing in aid of an unlawful strike may be enjoined is not affected by a statute declaring that it shall not be unlawful for members of trade unions or other organizations to induce by peaceable means any person to accept or relinquish any employment.[75] Under constitutional and statutory civil service provisions, where a city acquired a transit system and the employees of the system, on being classified in civil service, resigned from a union, it has been held that picketing to coerce them into resuming union membership could be enjoined, especially where the picketing was done at the employees' homes.[76] In a suit by an employer engaged in interstate commerce, who had entered into a union shop contract with one union, to enjoin picketing by a competing union, injunctive relief will be denied where the National Labor Relations Board has not determined under the National Labor Relations Act which union was the exclusive representative of the employees for the purpose of collective bargaining.[77]

c. Protection of Right of Union to Employ Pickets

The right to employ pickets in carrying on industrial warfare is not a proper subject of protection by means of an injunction.

The right of a voluntary association, engaged in supporting a strike but which is not conducting a business or trade of any kind, to freedom in the labor market, so that the association can readily employ pickets and other agents in carrying on industrial warfare, is not a proper subject of protection by means of an injunction.[78]

d. Who Entitled to Injunction

Where the circumstances justify an injunction, it may be obtained at the suit of the injured party.

Where the circumstances justify an injunction against picketing, it may be obtained at the suit of the injured party.[79] Thus a corporation's subsidiary which owned the premises picketed was not precluded from maintaining the injunction suit, not-

e. Against Whom Injunction Granted

Where the circumstances justify an injunction, it may issue against the person or persons who are committing or threatening to commit the acts complained of, or who are responsible for their commission.

Where the circumstances justify an injunction against picketing, the writ may issue against the person or persons who are committing or threatening to commit the acts complained of, or who are or may be responsible for their commission,[81] and this may include the offending union,[82] the officers of the union,[83] the members of the union,[84] their agents or servants,[85] and persons who aid or abet them in their unlawful acts or conduct.[86]

§ 146. Publication of Black List

A combination to blacklist may be enjoined in a proper case.

An employer acting within his rights will not be enjoined from keeping a book showing that he had discharged employees therein named for belonging to the union, or from notifying other employers that he keeps such a book and that they can inspect it.[87] On the other hand, a combination to blacklist may be enjoined when directed against persons with whom those combining have no trade dispute,[88] and this rule applies whether the combination is one of employers[89] or of laborers.[90] So the concerted action of a combination of employers which coerces the individual members, by threats or implied threats, or otherwise, to withhold employment from those whom ordinarily they would employ, may be enjoined.[91] The right to relief by injunction may be barred by misconduct.[92]

§ 147. Strikes

a. In general
b. Effect of statutory regulation of right
c. Who may be enjoined

a. In General

(1) Preventing strikes generally
(2) Compelling performance of services by employees remaining in service
(3) Restraining union from inducing or consenting to strike
(4) Restraining intermeddlers
(5) Restraining acts in furtherance of strike

(1) Preventing Strikes Generally

As a general rule the courts have no power by injunction to prevent an individual or a group of workmen from withdrawing from the service of his or their employer as long as the act is committed in a lawful manner, or to require men who cease work to go back.

A court of equity will not by injunction prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another.[93] Accordingly, although there is some contrary authority,[94] it has been held that the courts have no power to enjoin workmen from withdrawing in a body from the service of their employer,[95] as long as they do this in their own interest[96] and in a manner not in itself unlawful,[97] and as long as the refusal to work is not connected with an illegal combination to prevent another from securing workers;[98] and it is immaterial that such withdrawal involves a breach of contract to work for a definite period of time rendering those withdrawing liable in damages to the person injured[99] or to a criminal prosecution.[1] A departure from the rule is not justified by the fact that the employees sought to be enjoined are in the service of a receiver or a quasi-public corporation,[2] or that they may cease work under circumstances that would show bad faith on their part, or a reckless disregard of their contract or of the convenience and interest of both the employer and the public.[3] The motive actuating a strike is immaterial.[4] Further, an injunction is not justified by the fact that the strike hampers or threatens to stop the employer's interstate commerce, as long as it is but an unintended consequence of the lawful exercise of defendant's rights.[5] A court of equity is without power to make an order that men who quit work in violation of their contracts shall go back to work.[6]

(2) Compelling Performance of Services by Employees Remaining in Service

Employees who remain in the service of their employer may be compelled by injunction to perform the duties incident thereto.

While a court of equity, as shown supra subdivision a (1) of this section, has no power to compel employees to continue in the service of the employer, if the employees elect to remain in the service, performance of the duties incident thereto may be compelled by injunction.[8]

(3) Restraining Union from Inducing or Consenting to Strike

(a) In general

(b) Disciplinary measures of union to compel members to strike

(a) In General

Courts have no power to enjoin union officers acting in good faith from calling a lawful strike, but such officers may be restrained from calling an unlawful strike, as where the object to be attained by the strike is unlawful or where the means employed are not lawful.

Courts have no power to enjoin officers vested with the requisite authority and acting in good faith from calling a lawful strike by the members of the union which they represent, that is to say, a strike, the object of which the law regards as lawful, and which involves no breach of contract on the part of those called out.[9] The rule is in no way restricted or limited by the fact that the strike might incidentally interrupt the passage of the mails,[10] or the transportation of interstate commerce,[11] or by the fact that the employer is a receiver managing property under the direction of the court.[12] Especially should the rule not be denied or restricted where it is shown that the members have voted to strike, and that under the constitution and by-laws of the union no strike can be declared without the sanction of the officers.[13] So a labor union conducting a lawful strike for the benefit of its members will not be enjoined because of unlawful acts of its individual members which neither its officers nor committees directed or approved, unless such acts were committed in carrying out their orders.[14] Where a court of equity is without power to order strikers to resume work, the court will not, by mandatory injunction, compel officers of their union to make the men return to work.[15]

Unlawful strike. Although, as shown supra subdivision a (1) of this section, a combination of workmen cannot as a general rule be enjoined from striking, it does not follow, in the absence of statutes affecting the right, that officers of a union cannot be enjoined from calling a strike.[16] Officers of a union may be restrained from ordering a strike by its members, where their compliance with the order would constitute a breach of their contracts of employment,[17] or of the employer's agreement with the union,[18] or of a contract by which the employer and employees agreed to submit matters of difference to arbitration,[19] or where the object to be attained by the strike is unlawful[20] or in contravention of public policy.[21] So a combination to bring about a strike may be enjoined where the means employed are not lawful,[22] as where the strike is accompanied by violence.[23] An exception to the rule affirming the power of a court of equity to enjoin officers of a union from calling an unlawful strike has been recognized in a case where the members of a union have, in accordance with their constitution decided on a strike, and under the constitution and by-laws the consent of a designated officer must be obtained before the decision to strike can be carried into effect;[24] but such an exception to the rule also has been denied.[25]

(b) Disciplinary Measures of Union to Compel Members to Strike

Although circumstances may arise where the employment of such measures are improper and will be enjoined, disciplinary measures of a union to compel its members to strike will not ordinarily be restrained.

Officers and members of a union may be enjoined from attempting to coerce into striking members in the employ of persons with whom they have no trade dispute, by threats of fine and expulsion, for the purpose of coercing such employers into refraining from purchasing materials manufactured by a person with whom the union has a trade dispute.[26] An injunction has been granted in such a case to complainants who were members of defendant's union and also public officers.[27]

While there are some decisions to the contrary,[28] it is very generally held that, since, in furtherance of a lawful strike, labor unions may use such coercive measures as the imposition of fines, suspensions, or expulsions on their members, or threats to impose such penalties on them for disobedience of orders to strike or to continue on strike after going out, such acts will not be enjoined at the suit of the employer against whom the strike is called.[29] The operation of this rule is not affected by a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for a person by threats, force, or intimidation to prevent an employee from continuing or performing his work;[30] nor by the fact that the members against whom the disciplinary measures are directed are employees of a railroad operated by a receiver.[31]

Where members under contract for definite time. Where penalties, such as fines, suspension, or expulsion, are imposed or threatened to cause members to join in or continue on strike, and such members are under contracts to work for a definite time for the employer against whom the strike has been declared, such acts may be enjoined.[32]

(4) Restraining Intermeddlers

Intermeddlers may be restrained from inciting or coercing strikes where it is necessary to prevent irreparable injury.

When necessary to prevent irreparable injury, an injunction will be granted to prevent third persons having no connection with employer or employees, and no interest in the relations existing between them, from inciting or coercing strikes among employees who are not dissatisfied with the terms of their employment and are not seeking an increase of wages.[33] Thus persons not employed by plaintiff may be enjoined from soliciting his employees to strike in breach of their contract of employment.[34]

(b) Persuading others to join strike
(c) Persuading others not to accept employment
(d) Fraud to induce others to strike
(e) Force, violence, or intimidation to prevent others from working
(f) Payment of benefits to members or nonmembers

(a) In General

Unlawful acts in furtherance of a lawful or unlawful strike may be enjoined if the conditions which make an injunction proper are present, and any acts in furtherance of an unlawful strike may likewise be restrained; but lawful acts in furtherance of a lawful strike will not be enjoined.

An injunction will not lie to prevent lawful acts in aid of a lawful strike.[35] On the other hand, where the strike is unlawful, acts done in furtherance thereof, although innocent in themselves, are necessarily of the same character and may be enjoined if the conditions which call for equitable relief by injunction are present;[36] and this doctrine is not affected by a statute making it lawful to persuade or attempt to persuade another to do anything not unlawful, actionable, or in violation of duty, etc.[37] Unlawful acts in furtherance of a strike, whether it is lawful or unlawful, may be enjoined if the conditions which make an injunction proper are present;[38] and this is so although the acts are punishable criminally.[39] The means employed in aid of a lawful strike must be free from falsehood, libel, or defamation, and from physical violence, coercion, or moral intimidation.[40] It has been held, however, that unlawful acts to effectuate a lawful strike do not taint the lawful purpose of the strike so as to justify an injunction against lawful acts to accomplish such purpose.[41] If, however, one purpose of the strike is lawful and another purpose unlawful, all acts of whatever character in furtherance of such strike are unlawful and will be enjoined.[42] It has been held that the drawing of wagons through the streets carrying placards announcing the existence of a strike long after the strike has terminated will be enjoined.[43]

(b) Persuading Others to Join Strike

Peaceful persuasion to procure workmen to join a lawful strike will not be enjoined, but the rule is otherwise where the strike is unlawful, or where the persuasion is so persistent as to constitute unlawful coercion.

An injunction will not lie to restrain strikers in the furtherance of a lawful strike from using peaceful persuasion, argument, or entreaty to procure other workmen to join them in the strike.[44] Persuasion too emphatic or too long and persistently continued, however, may itself become a nuisance and its use a form of unlawful coercion, restrainable by injunction.[45] It has been held that a final order enjoining peaceful persuasion is not improper

when at the time there was no longer a controversy between complainant and its employees respecting terms and conditions of employment, and it appeared that the strike had long ceased to exist except for certain annoying manifestations on the part of a comparatively few people.[46] The fact that interstate commerce may be incidentally interrupted thereby does not affect the operation of the rule.[47]

Unlawful strike. If the strike is itself unlawful, even peaceable persuasion in furtherance of it will be enjoined if the conditions which call for equitable relief by injunction are present.[48]

(c) Persuading Others Not to Accept Employment

Strikers will not be restrained from using peaceful persuasion to induce other workmen not to accept employment from the employer against whom a lawful strike is in operation.

An injunction will not lie to restrain strikers from using peaceful persuasion and argument to induce other workmen not to accept employment from the employer against whom a lawful strike is in operation,[49] provided the persuasion used is of such a nature as not to amount to coercion.[50]

(d) Fraud to Induce Others to Strike

Procuring workmen by means of fraud to join a strike may be enjoined.

Procuring workmen to quit their employment and join in a strike, by means of fraud, is unlawful and in a proper case may be enjoined.[51]

(e) Force, Violence, or Intimidation to Prevent Others from Working

The use of force, violence, coercion, or intimidation to prevent employees from working or other workmen from accepting employment from the employer against whom a strike is in operation may be enjoined.

The use of force, violence, coercion, or intimidation to prevent employees from working for the employer against whom the strike is in operation, or to prevent other workmen from accepting employment from him, is not permissible and an injunction will be granted to prevent the commission of such acts,[52] and it is immaterial that the strike is for a lawful purpose.[53] It is not necessary that there should have been actual violence or physical assaults, but it will be sufficient if threats, abusive language, or other acts amounting to intimidation and depriving those against whom the acts were directed of the power to exercise their own will in determining whether or not they should work, were used.[54] An injunction restraining continuance of unlawful practices by strikers will not be denied because of the discontinuance of such practices shortly before issuance of the injunction, where the strike is still in progress and the recurrence of the unlawful acts is probable.[55] In the absence of statutes affecting the right, see infra subdivision b of this section, refusal of an employer to arbitrate differences with his employees furnishes no ground for refusal by a court of equity to enjoin acts of this character committed in aid of the strike.[56]

(f) Payment of Benefits to Members or Nonmembers

A union ordinarily will not be restrained from rendering financial assistance to striking workmen, whether or not they are members of the union.

While there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[57] it generally is held that no injunction will be granted at the instance of a person against whom a strike is directed to prevent a union from rendering financial assistance, in furtherance of a lawful strike, to its members who have gone out on a strike by giving them strike pay;[58] nor has an employer any standing to enjoin a union, to which the strikers belong, from giving financial assistance,[59] such as the payment of weekly benefits and the expenses of transportation from place to place[60] to nonunion workmen, to induce them to quit the employer's service. The rule enunciated applies equally whether those to whom the assistance is rendered merely join in the strike,[61] or in addition thereto join the union.[62]

According to some authorities an employer may have a right to an injunction to prevent the payment of strike benefits in aid of an unlawful strike[63] although the opposite view has also been taken.[64]

b. Effect of Statutory Regulation of Right

(1) Norris-La Guardia Act and state statutes similar thereto

(2) Clayton Act and state statutes similar thereto

(1) Norris-La Guardia Act and State Statutes Similar Thereto

Under the Norris-La Guardia Act and state statutes, similar in nature, general injunctions cannot be issued against striking whether or not the strike is illegal, although the strike is subject to some restraint where unlawful acts have been threatened and committed and the requirements of the statute have been fully complied with.

Under the provision of the Norris-La Guardia Act denying to the federal courts jurisdiction in cases growing out of labor disputes to prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from ceasing or refusing to perform any work or to remain in any relation of employment, general injunctions cannot be issued against striking.[65] The test is no longer given the uncertain elasticity of "illegality,"[66] and whether or not the strike is illegal, because of its purpose, is immaterial.[67] A strike is subject to some restraint, however, where unlawful acts have been threatened and committed and will be committed and continued unless restrained;[68] but only specific acts of individuals, and not the strike itself, can be enjoined.[69] Furthermore, violence or fraud in the conduct of a strike cannot be enjoined unless there has been a compliance with the requirements of the act,[70] such as the requirement that a showing that the local law enforcement agencies were unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection to the employer[71] and the requirement of a bond.[72]

Under state statutes patterned on the federal Norris-La Guardia Act, which are considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (b) cc, a strike for a lawful purpose, conducted in a lawful manner, cannot be enjoined;[73] but, where the statutory requirements have been complied with, violence, intimidation, and coercion in the conduct of a strike may be restrained.[74] Under a statute providing that no injunction shall issue in any case involving a labor dispute except after a finding that unlawful acts have "or a breach of any contract not contrary to public policy has" been threatened or committed, and that such acts or breach will be executed or continued unless restrained, the quoted section, which is not to be found in the federal statute, indicates that the legislature had no intention of depriving the court of the power formerly possessed by it to enjoin a strike where a breach of any contract not contrary to public policy has been threatened or committed, provided the other requisite facts are found to exist.[75] Accordingly, where all the requirements of the statute have been met, a strike characterized by acts of violence and called without cause in violation of a collective bargaining agreement may be enjoined.[76] Such an injunction, it has been said, does not compel the men in the union to return to work, but merely enjoins the union from calling or continuing a strike in violation of its contractual obligation and doing acts which might be legal were a strike actually in existence.[77] No injunction will be granted in a case involving a labor dispute unless there has been a full compliance with the statutory requirements.[78]

(2) Clayton Act and State Statutes Similar Thereto

The Clayton Act and state statutes of similar nature prohibit injunctions to restrain strikers in the furtherance of a lawful strike from using peaceful persuasion but do not affect the power of the court to enjoin the use of violence or intimidation, or from restraining acts committed in furtherance of an unlawful strike; and furthermore such statutes do not apply to disputes between an employer and persons who are neither past, present, nor prospective employees.

Under the Clayton Act, which is considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (a) bb, and which provides that employees shall not be restrained from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means to quit work, an injunction will not lie to restrain strikers in the furtherance of a lawful strike from using peaceful persuasion, argument, or entreaty to procure other workmen to join them in the strike;[79] but the statute does not in any way affect the power of a court of equity to enjoin the use of force, violence, or intimidation to prevent others from working.[80] The provisions of the Clayton Act apply only in cases growing out of the disputes between employer and employee or persons seeking employment, and not to disputes between an employer and persons who are neither ex-employees nor seeking employment,[81] and do not prohibit a federal court from restraining persons who were not past, present, or prospective employees of plaintiff from seeking to induce employees to strike in breach of their contracts of employment[82] or for the purpose of gaining recognition of the union.[83] Notwithstanding the act, if the strike is itself unlawful even peaceable persuasion in furtherance of it will be enjoined if the conditions which call for equitable relief by injunction are present.[84] The provision of the act prohibiting the issuance of injunctions unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury refers not to such irreparable injury as is the natural and inevitable result of the strike, but embraces only direct injuries to new employees or to the property of the employer by acts of trespass or violence, or obstruction of the employer in obtaining new employees by means of threats, abuse, or violence.[85] So it has been held that the act prohibited an injunction restraining railroad employees from striking in a peaceable manner, even though their strike would be a breach of an agreement entered into under the Transportation Act, since such breach would not be irreparable injury within the meaning of the Clayton Act.[86]

State statutes similar to the Clayton Act, which are considered generally supra § 138 b (2) (b) bb, do not in any way affect the power of a court of equity to enjoin officers of a union from calling an unlawful strike[87] to enjoin acts done in furtherance of an unlawful strike although innocent in themselves,[88] or to enjoin the use of force, violence, or intimidation to prevent others from working.[89]

c. Who May Be Enjoined

union or its officers may be enjoined from interfering by force, violence, intimidation, or threats with the peaceful operation of the business of an individual or corporation.[90] Although there is authority holding that all the members of a union cannot be enjoined because certain members of the union committed unlawful acts,[91] it has been held that it is not sufficient to prevent an injunction for a labor union, whose members are on a strike, to repudiate their acts in the conduct of the strike, where it does not discipline them sufficiently to prevent a repetition of the acts.[92]

(1) Definition and Nature

A trade secret is a new process, mechanism, or compound known only to its owner and those employees to whom it has necessarily been confided. To be subject to protection by injunction it must be kept in substantial, although not absolute, secrecy, but it need not be patented or patentable.

A trade secret, within the rules pertaining to the rights which can be protected by injunction, is a plan, process, tool, mechanism, or compound, known only to its owner and those of his employees to whom it must be confided in order to apply it to the uses intended.[93] It differs from a patent in that as soon as the secret is discovered, either by an examination of the product or in any other honest way, the discoverer has the full right to use it,[94] and it may be protected by injunction irrespective of whether the process or plan constituting the secret is or is not a patentable invention.[95] Further a trade secret need not be protected by patent,[96] copyright,[97] or registered trade-mark[98] to enable its owner to enjoin its unauthorized use or disclosure; and, indeed, a claim that an invention is protected as a trade secret is incompatible with a claim that it is protected under the patent law, since protection to a trade secret is afforded only if there has been no public disclosure whereas a patented invention must have been clearly described in the application for the patent.[99] To constitute a new process subject to protection by injunction there must be employed creative faculties in originating it amounting to a meritorious discovery or invention,[1]

Alloy with new properties

Where an alloy is entirely different in the matter of uniformity of color and freedom from imperfections from any other metal manufactured, the right to protect the process for its production as a secret and a mere mechanical advance in the use of a process is not a new process or discovery which will be so protected.[2] A secret formula need not be in writing to be protected by injunction.[3]

Secrecy. While it is not necessary, in order to justify relief by injunction, that a formula or process be wholly secret, qualified secrecy being sufficient,[4] nevertheless there must be a substantial element of secrecy so that, except by the use of improper means, third persons would have difficulty in acquiring the information needed for making the product.[5] A process or formula disclosed by its originator to numerous persons or commonly known to the trade is not a trade secret and will not be protected by injunction,[6] although the mere fact that there are secret processes of a different kind accomplishing the same result will not prevent the granting of an injunction.[7] Matters which are completely disclosed by the articles themselves are not secret after the articles are put on the market,[8] but owners of a trade secret will not be deprived of their remedy because they necessarily made a disclosure to the court for the purpose of a suit to protect it.[9]

(2) Protection by Injunction in General

Injunction is a proper remedy to protect use or disclosure of a trade secret in violation of trust and confidence where the remedy at law is inadequate. Such relief is available only to the extent of actual infringement, although a use which in fact infringes is not protected by the fact that there is some slight difference in detail.

A trade secret is a property right which equity will protect by injunction against unwarranted disclosure and unauthorized use by others than the rightful owner.[10] The general requirement for relief is a violation of trust and confidence,[11] and in-process does not depend on whether the result was within the expected mechanical skill of a foundryman or was achieved by experimentation with known factors, or on whether the means by which the discovery was made were obvious.—Dirigold Metals Corporation v. Protection will be afforded all applied methods, formulas, and processes in which a proprietary interest may be acquired in connection with the manufacture, and even marketing, of a product.—Progress Laundry Co. v. Hamilton, 270 S.W. 834, 208 Ky. 348.

Scope of injunction

Manufacturer attempting unauthorized use of trade secrets should be restrained from using the secret formulas, processes, and other trade secrets of complainant and from representing to the trade that he can manufacture according to those formulas, but should not be restrained from representing that he can furnish articles equal in quality, or from soliciting business from the trade generally.—Maas & Waldstein Co. v. 11. U.S.—Allen-Qualley Co. v. Shellmar Products Co., D.C.Ill., 31 F.2d 293, affirmed, C.C.A., Shellmar junction is a proper remedy because an action at law does not furnish an adequate remedy.[12] On broad equitable principles and in consideration of public policy, relief by injunction should not be granted unless the claim that the plan or process is a trade secret is clearly established;[13] especially must there be a strong case before the court will enjoin the use of information honestly obtained.[14] The obligation of one bound not to disclose a secret process, or not to use a secret process that has been improperly disclosed, may be violated by using a process differing only slightly in detail, to produce an identical result[15] although if there are several steps in making a particular product, some of which are not secret but are well known to, and used by, others in making competing products, injunction will lie only as to the steps involving the use of the trade secret.[16]

(3) Persons Protected

Injunctive protection for a trade secret is afforded only to the discoverer of the secret or to a purchaser or assignee thereof who has acquired the sole right to its use.

One who is not the discoverer and has acquired no right to the trade secret cannot maintain a suit for an injunction,[17] the right to such injunction being limited to one who owns a secret process of manufacture which was discovered and invented by himself or by another for him,[18] or to one who has acquired the sole right to use such secret.[19] The purchaser or assignee of the exclusive property in the secret may have an injunction to prevent the disclosure of the secret by the assignor or third persons who have acquired a knowledge of the secret in confidence,[20] but he will not be protected against the assignor where the conditions of the assignment have not been performed.[21] One who has purchased a trade secret cannot enjoin another to whom the discoverer has subsequently sold the same secret without showing that defendant has been guilty of a breach of confidence or contract with complainant.[22] The owner of a secret process does not lose the right to enjoin the use thereof by another in violation of trust by subsequently granting to a third person the exclusive right to make the product.[23]

(4) Persons Enjoined

Injunction against disclosure of a trade secret may be had against employees or other persons whose knowledge thereof was acquired by improper means, or, although properly acquired, was obtained in trust and confidence or under an express promise not to divulge it to others; and where such employees or other persons have disclosed their knowledge to third persons having notice of the violation of duty such third persons may also be enjoined. On the other hand, protection is not afforded against persons who have discovered the secret fairly and by independent means.

One who by reason of confidential business relations with the discoverer or owner has gained possession of his trade secret will be restrained by a court of equity from betraying the trust imposed in him by using the secret for his own gain,[24] a confidential relation within this rule being one which

Existence of adequate remedy at law

Where the inventor of a machine proposed to disclose his secret for a consideration consisting of the profit he would receive from the sale of the number of such machines needed by a prospective purchaser for a particular undertaking, and where the prospective purchaser began to construct a similar machine, but there was no intimation that such purchaser intended to manufacture the machine for sale to the public or for any purpose other than for the particular undertaking, the inventor was not entitled to an injunction since, in the absence of any showing of insolvency on the part of the prospective purchaser, the inventor had an adequate remedy at law for damages.—Brown & Root v. Manufacturer

gives rise to a duty not to use or divulge the secret to the detriment of the owner.[25] A fortiori, injunction will lie against one whose use or disclosure of the secret would constitute not only a breach of confidence but also a violation of contract.[26] One whose knowledge of a trade secret is originally acquired by improper means,[27] as in the case of a person who has obtained a knowledge of a secret process of manufacture through fraud or bad faith,[28] will be enjoined from using it. On the other hand, trade secrets are not given protection against all the world or persons who have not learned the secret by improper means or by virtue of a confidential relation;[29] all that the owner of a trade secret is entitled to is protection from a breach of contract or confidence against one to whom he has confided the secret and those to whom such person may divulge it,[30] and anyone who honestly and fairly comes into possession of the secret has the right to use, disclose, or sell it without being subject to restraint by injunction.[31] Where the originator of a formula turns it over to a manufacturer but makes no agreement granting the manufacturer the exclusive right to manufacture and sell and does not obligate himself not to disclose the formula to others or to refrain from competing in business, an injunction seeking to prevent him from using the formula or disclosing it to others and from competing in business is properly refused.[32]

Employees. An employee who from a confidential relation to his employer has acquired knowledge of his employer's trade secrets, or other secrets important to the business of the employer, is under a duty or implied obligation not to divulge or use such knowledge to the injury of the employer, and he may be enjoined from any violation of such duty;[33]

la can restrain a manufacturer to whom he has disclosed the formula under a promise of secrecy.—Schavoir v. American Rebonded Leather Co., 133 A. 582, 104 Conn. 472.

Selling agent

Where agent was hired to sell machine which was a trade secret and it became necessary for him, in order to sell the machine, to become familiar with the secret and he would not otherwise have known it, he will not be permitted to make use of this knowledge for his own use or disclose it to third persons.—Kelly Mfg. Co. v. Brower, 1 Tenn.App. 428.

Manager of corporation

Where plaintiff employed a corporation to construct automatic welding machine according to ideas conceived by plaintiff's officers, and corporation gave a pledge of secrecy as to design of the machine, plaintiff was entitled to injunction restraining manager of the corporation, and another company of which the manager had become president, from constructing a similar machine for plaintiff's competitor.—Mitchell Metal Products v. Berkeley Equipment Co., D.C.Pa., 36 F.Supp. 1010.

a fortiori, such injunction will lie against an employee who is under express contract not to divulge such secrets.[34] Injunction will lie against the employee regardless of the character of the secret, if peculiar and important to the business of the employer,[35] and irrespective of whether the manufacture by complainant of the article to which the secret relates was ultra vires.[36] One who, on the termination of his employment, carries away records or documents containing trade secrets or other confidential matters relating to the employer's business will be enjoined from using such records in a similar business for the purpose of taking away business from his former employer for himself or others.[37] Injunctive relief may be had before or after the employee has left the employ of the one in whose service he acquired knowledge of the trade secret.[38] One who has employed an independent contractor under a pledge of secrecy can have injunctive relief against a person employed by the independent contractor who has obtained his knowledge from the independent contractor in violation of the pledge;[39] and it is immaterial whether the independent contractor's violation of his pledge was intentional or otherwise.[40]

The equitable power to restrain a former employee from using or disclosing an alleged trade secret will be exercised with great caution,[41] and the circumstances of the particular case may be such as not to justify the granting of injunction.[42] Thus such injunction will not lie where the use or disclosure sought to be enjoined is one that the employee has a right to make,[43] as where it pertains to a formula or compound which, although developed by the employee during the period of his employment, was not the property of the employer under the terms of the employment contract;[44] nor will such injunction lie where the complainant has not taken proper precautions to protect his secret,[45] as where the claimed secret is as to methods or practices in open usage at the employer's place of business and the employee was not employed in a confidential capacity or bound by agreement not to make any disclosures.[46] An employer cannot have injunctive relief against a former employee to prohibit him from entering into a business in which work of a similar nature is to be done by a third person in a manner entirely independent of any trade secrets or secret processes developed by the employer.[47] An injunction restraining a former employee from violating a contract not to use a secret process may be refused where the employer has ceased to use the process before bringing its suit and there is no irreparable injury.[48]

Third persons with knowledge. Where there is a contract or duty on the part of an employee or other person not to disclose a trade secret intrusted to him, equity will restrain the use of information acquired in violation of that contract or duty by persons having notice or knowledge of it;[49] and this is so although such persons might in time have reached the same result by their own independent experiments or efforts.[50] Nevertheless, in an action to enjoin a defendant from using a secret process disclosed to him by such an employee, complainant must prove the existence of such process, its value in his business, his right to the use of the secret, and that the secret was communicated to the employee while in a position of trust, so as to make it inequitable for him to disclose it to the prejudice of his employer.[51]

b. Information as to Customers

While the authorities are not unanimous, the general rule is that an ordinary employee who does not hold a position of trust or confidence cannot be enjoined, after the termination of his employment, from soliciting his former employer's customers, particularly where in so doing he relies only on his memory or where the number of customers is limited and readily ascertainable; but knowledge of the names and requirements of customers gained in confidence and not available to the public generally cannot be disclosed, and particularly will he be enjoined from an unauthorized use of a former employer's written list of customers.

The law has been said to be in confusion regarding the right of an employee to quit his employment, engage in business for himself, or enter the employment of another, in competition with his former employer, and to solicit business from the customers of the latter, where knowledge of those customers has been obtained by the employee during the course of his employment, and there is no contract prohibiting the employee from engaging in such business, taking such employment, or soliciting such customers.[52] In most jurisdictions it has been held that an employee's knowledge of his employer's customers, acquired by him as an ordinary employee and not by virtue of any peculiar trust or confidence placed in him, is not a trade secret against the use of which injunction will lie, and that where there is no express contract prohibiting the solicitation of such customers by the employee after the termination of his employment he cannot be enjoined from such solicitation as long as he proceeds on his memory rather than by the unauthorized use of a list of customers;[53] but in the view of some authorities the names of the customers of a business concern whose trade and patronage have been secured by business effort and the expenditure of time and money, constituting a part of the good will of a business which enterprise and foresight have built up, should be deemed just as sacred and entitled to the same protection as a secret of compounding some article of manufacture and commerce,[54] and following this view it has been held that an employee delivering a commodity or service at retail to the public on a particular route may be enjoined from soliciting such customers after terminating his employment.[55] It is generally agreed that injunction will lie to prevent use or disclosure by an agent or employee of knowledge of the names of the cus-

Absence of misrepresentation
Employer is not entitled to relief against former salesman on the ground that the salesman delivered a similar product to some of his old customers without stating whose product it was, in the absence of proof that the salesman thereby falsely represented that he was selling his former employer's product. —Di Angeles v. tomers of his former principal or employer, or of the customs, requirements, and preferences of such customers, where such information is of a confidential nature, not ordinarily ascertainable by the general public, and was obtained by the agent or employee for a specific purpose or by virtue of a fiduciary or confidential relation between him and his principal or employer;[56] and in such cases injunction will lie notwithstanding the employee knows the names of the customers from memory and has not compiled a written list thereof.[57] On the other hand, in the absence of express contract, equity will not enjoin an agent or servant, after termination of his employment, from soliciting business from the customers or patrons of his former principal or employer, where by so doing no business secret or trust which has been reposed in him because of his relation as agent or servant is violated.[58]

Where the employee is under a duty not to disclose or use the names of customers the injunction may run against his new employer, particularly if the new employer has caused, or knowingly participates in, the employee's violation of duty.[59] On the other hand, the new employer may not be enjoined from using his knowledge of the former employer's customers, acquired by the employee while in the former employment, where no breach of confidence is involved.[60]

Use of lists. It is generally agreed that an employee or agent can be restrained from using any list of customers, or copy thereof, made surreptitiously by him during his employment without the knowledge or consent of the employer or principal, or a list compiled by and belonging to the employer or principal and furnished to the employee in connection with his employment, at least where the list is a confidential one;[61] and this is so although new

Creditor as manager

A creditor's knowledge of the names and addresses of his debtor's customers acquired as a result of being permitted to keep the debtor's books, manage his office, and collect sums due him constituted confidential business information which the creditor could be restrained from using to solicit such customers for himself.—Barnes v. Cahill, 133 P.2d 433, 56 Cal.App.2d 780.

Circumstances held not to affect rule

An employee's confidential knowledge of the names of his employer's customers is not rendered less confidential, or his use of such knowledge rendered less an abuse of confidence, merely because a spy might have discovered the same information or because the employer could have protected himself by special contract.—Colonial Laundries v. Rule unaffected by provision for liquidated damages

That salesman's contract provides for liquidated damages for failure to return secret trade list does not warrant salesman in turning list over to business rival.—Messenger Pub. Co. v. Mokstad, 257 Ill.App. 161.

Agreement made after termination of employment

The fact that the employee has al-

customers have been added to the list by the employee.[62] On the other hand, it has been held that possession by a former employee of a written list of names of the customers of his former employer is not ground for the issuance of an injunction where, although the employee obtained such names in part from records of a former employee and in part from his own work as employee, such names were not derived from any confidential information and did not constitute a trade secret;[63] and it has also been held that the fact that an employee has secretly copied from his employer's books the names of his customers, although tending to show bad faith, does not of itself authorize an injunction completely restraining the employee from entering into the same kind of business.[64]

Limited number of customers. An employer cannot have injunctive relief based on the alleged use of a list of customers by a former employee where because of the nature of the business the number of prospective customers is limited or readily discovered, as where the customers are wholesale buyers or retail dealers whose places of business are recognizable by any one and whose identities and addresses can be ascertained by simple observation or by reference to telephone or business directories.[65] However, even in cases in which the customers are wholesale buyers or easily ascertainable concerns, injunction may lie against a former employee or agent where in soliciting such customers he acts pursuant to a deliberate, preconceived plan to injure the business of his former employer over a well established route which such employer has built up,[66] or where he seeks to take advantage of his former employment not only with respect to the identity of customers but also the personal acquaintance and friendly contact established between them and himself as well as his knowledge of their places of residence and their peculiar likes or other characteristics.[67]

Information improperly acquired by employer seeking injunction. One who engages individuals to follow employees of his competitor to secure the names and addresses of the competitor's customers for the purpose of inducing a switch of business is not entitled to an injunction protecting the information so gathered on the theory of a trade secret.[68]

§ 149. Other Matters Connected with Trade, Business, or Employment

a. Assertion of business affiliation
b. Claims of patent infringement
c. Miscellaneous

a. Assertion of Business Affiliation

Injunction will lie to prevent an individual from wrongfully holding himself out as the partner of another to the latter's injury. A partner or employee who enters business for himself will not be enjoined from announcing his former affiliation, provided he does not thereby mislead the public.

A person will be restrained from holding himself out as a partner, where such representation may cause injury to complainant, and such claim has no foundation in fact.[69] One who has formerly been associated in business with another as a partner ready left his former employer at the time he agrees with his new employer to use the list does not prevent the injunction, since the implied contract of an employee that he will not divulge confidential knowledge gained in the course of his employment exists as well after the employment is terminated as during its continuance.—Friedman v. Stewarts Credit Corporation, 26 N.Y.S.2d 529, affirmed 26 N.Y.S.2d 533, 261 App.Div. 990, reargument denied 28 N.Y.S.2d 156, 262 App.Div. 746.

Sales to factory workmen
One engaged in the box lunch business and selling principally to factory workmen could not enjoin former routemen from competing since the existence and location of large factories is easily discovered by anyone and the knowledge gained by the routemen in their employment therefore not a trade secret.—Haut v. Rossbach, supra.
List of tailors
In the absence of fraud, or of an express contract not to go into business or to solicit the employer's customers, a driver for a dyer and cleaner, whose business it is to deliver to and solicit tailors' trade, has a right on leaving the employment to try to build up his own business by direct solicitation of the former employer's customers and others, there being nothing secret about getting up a list of tailors, and injunctive relief should have been denied employer.—Goldberg v. or employee may, on setting up a separate business for himself, make a public announcement of this fact, as by putting up a sign so stating, and an injunction will not lie to restrain him from doing so.[70] However, he will be restrained from doing this in a manner calculated to lead to the belief that he is carrying on the business of the old firm.[71] A vendor of a business cannot enjoin another from holding himself out as his successor where the vendor has ceased doing business for a long time and hence suffers no injury from the acts of the other.[72]

b. Claims of Patent Infringement

Unwarranted claims of patent infringement, misrepresentations as to decrees rendered in a patent suit, and threats of infringement suits, made in bad faith and for the purpose of diverting business from a competitor, ordinarily will be enjoined. On the other hand, injunction will not lie against a patentee for statements made by him truthfully and in good faith.

While there is some authority to the effect that injunction will not lie to restrain a patentee from circulating among the customers of another notices falsely stating that such other cannot manufacture and sell a particular product because it infringes the patent, even if such statements are made without intent to follow them with infringement suits,[73] it is generally considered that a person or corporation can be restrained from injuring the business of a competitor by making claims of patent infringement and threats of suit therefor to the trade generally or to customers of the rival concern where the claims or threats are made in bad faith and without adequate basis,[74] and that such person or corporation can in this connection be particularly restrained from misusing or misrepresenting orders or decrees of the court in a patent litigation.[75] On the other hand, where the owner of a patent, in good faith, makes truthful statements concerning his patent and warns and notifies persons against infringement, he does not thereby render himself liable to an injunction,[76] and an injunction may not be granted where there is a reasonable doubt as to the propriety of the patentee's actions.[77] Injunction will not issue where the representations have been made in only a single instance and there is no unusual circumstance or clear proof of bad faith, and no show-

Injunction pending determination of infringement action

Plaintiffs in patent infringement action were restrained from addressing circulars and communications to manufacturers' customers about the litigation, pending determination of the infringement action or a similar action pending in another court, where plaintiffs had twice represented to court that action could not proceed to trial because of unavailability of witnesses and statements by a responsible officer of one plaintiff indicated an intention to bring, for coercive reasons, other actions against dealers or customers of manufacturers defending the action.—Thomas French & Sons v. ing of conspiracy, intimidation, or coercion.[78] Where a machine or process is patented, although the product thereof is not, the owner of the patent may, as long as he acts fairly and honestly, notify customers of another concern that such concern is guilty of infringement and that litigation is being brought against such concern to protect the patent rights; and this is so notwithstanding the patentee does not await the outcome of the infringement suit and notwithstanding the customers incur no legal liability to the patentee by virtue of their purchases of the product;[79] but injunction will lie to restrain the patentee from sending communications to the customers which are so worded as to carry the thought of threatened litigation against them.[80] Injunction will lie to enjoin one from representing or advertising, without adequate basis, that the patent of a rival concern is invalid.[81]

c. Miscellaneous

The right to injunctive relief as to matters connected with trade, business, or employment, other than those already considered in the preceding sections, has been adjudicated in a variety of cases, and relief held available or not depending on the particular circumstances.

The general rule which has been stated supra § 138, to the effect that in a proper case equity will enjoin an illegal interference with the right of a person to carry on a lawful business, has been applied under many and various circumstances; other matters in addition to those specifically considered supra subdivisions a and b of this section have been held proper subjects of injunction[82] or not to be such subjects.[83] An injunction will issue to restrain one engaged in selling goods similar to those

(5) To prevent members of county agricultural conservation association from exercising authority under Agricultural Adjustment Act.—Hawthorne v. Fisher, D.C.Tex., 33 F.Supp. 891.

(6) To prevent members of wholesale dealers association from watching the business place of a wholesale dealer to determine who was furnishing him with goods in violation of their contract with the manufacturer.—Park v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assoc., 67 N.E. 136, 175 N.Y. 1, 96 Am.S.R. 587, 62 L.R.A. 632.

(7) To prevent motion picture producer from distributing picture dealt in by a merchant next door from interfering with his neighbor's business by keeping a number of employees standing about, who molest and interfere with customers, actual or prospective, who are looking into his neighbor's show window.[84] A corporation claiming the right to furnish gas under an unconstitutional act may be enjoined from asserting those rights where the effect of such assertion is to prevent another company from selling its stock and receiving commissions for the purpose of supplying the gas.[85] It has been held that the enforcement of a tax, although it may compel the suspension of plaintiff's business, is not what is known to the law as irreparable injury.[86]

The rights of duly licensed practitioners of law to protection against interference with such rights by unlicensed practitioners are considered supra § 123, and the similar rights of practitioners of medicine and allied professions to protection are discussed supra § 124.

H. CRIMINAL ACTS AND CONSPIRACIES

§ 150. In General

A violation of the criminal laws will not, as a general rule, be enjoined.

Except where there is express statutory authority therefor,[87] equity has no criminal jurisdiction, and acts or omissions will not be enjoined merely on the ground that they constitute a violation of law and are punishable as crimes.[88] Under ordinary

Gambling

A statute authorizing any citizen to institute suit to enjoin the habitual use of any premises for gaming or keeping or exhibiting games prohibited by law does not authorize a citizen to maintain suit to enjoin the legal operation of a horse-race track where betting was conducted under the certificate system.—Panas v. Texas Breeders & Racing Ass'n, Tex.Civ.App., 80 S.W.2d 1020, error dismissed.

stitute an effectual protection against the acts or omissions complained of, no grounds exist for relief by injunction.[90] The objections to "criminal equity" are that it deprives defendant of his jury trial;[91] that it deprives him of the protection of the higher burden of proof required in criminal prosecutions;[92] that, after imprisonment and fine for violation of an equity injunction, defendant may be subjected under the criminal law to punishment for the same acts;[93] that it substitutes for the definite penalties fixed by the legislature whatever punishment for contempt a particular judge may see fit to exact;[94] that it is often no more than an attempt to overcome by circumvention the supposed shortcomings of jurors;[95] and that it may result, or induce the public to believe that it results, in the arbitrary exercise of power and in government by injunction.[96] The possibility that many persons will violate the law and that many suits will be required to enforce it,[97] the mere fact that the officers charged with the duty of enforcing the provisions of the criminal law neglect or refuse to perform their duty in this regard,[98] the failure of local juries to convict,[99] or the fact that the punishment for the crime is inadequate[1] does not warrant relief by injunction.

§ 151. Acts Affecting Civil or Property Rights

Injunction will issue to inhibit a criminal act when that act invades civil or property rights and where there is no other adequate remedy available.

Where the intervention of equity by injunction is warranted by the necessity of protection to civil rights or property interests and the inadequacy of a criminal prosecution to effect this purpose, the mere fact that a crime or statutory offense must be enjoined as incidental thereto will not operate to deprive the court of its jurisdiction.[2] The power of equity to enjoin the doing of acts threatening ir-

Delay

The presumption will prevail that, when a case is appealed from the corporation court to the county court, the latter will not dismiss it without reason, or unnecessarily or arbitrarily postpone or delay hearing on such case, and such an allegation forms no basis for the issuance of a writ of injunction against those violating the law.—City of San Antonio v. Schutte, Tex.Civ.App., 246 S.W. 413.

Fact that it costs money or effort or time to enforce the criminal laws is not ground to support a contention that adequate relief cannot be granted at law.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Fritz, 45 N.E.2d 48, 316 Ill.App. 217.

Multiplicity of suits

"Where the enforcement of criminal law is merely incidental to general relief sought in equity, it is well settled that a court of equity may grant relief by injunction. . . . But the converse is not true. If the property right was merely incidental and the political question predominate, the court of equity would have no power to grant an injunction."—People ex rel. Barrett v. Fritz, 45 N.E.2d 48, 56, 316 Ill.App. 217.

Acts enjoined

Where statute or ordinance makes it penal to violate its provisions, injunction against person threatening violation of statute or ordinance runs against commission of acts prohibited by measure, not against mere violation of law.—Sapiro v. Frisbie, 270 P. 280, 93 Cal.App. 299.

Aiders and abettors

A suit to enjoin persons who are aiding and abetting the commission of unlawful acts is valid.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., D.C.Cal., 28 F. Supp. 34—Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Price, C.C.A.Mo., 213 F. 336.

An individual can enjoin the violation of a city ordinance resulting in injury to the individual.—Bailer v. Ringe, 8 N.Y.S.2d 99, 255 App.Div. 976, reargument denied 9 N.Y.S.2d 581, 256 App.Div. 818.

Invalid ordinance

Violation of an invalid ordinance will not be enjoined.—Maplewood Tp. v. Margolis, 136 A. 707, 5 N.J.Misc. 359, affirmed 138 A. 924, 101 N.J. Eq. 778, certiorari denied 48 S.Ct. 212 (first case), 276 U.S. 617, 72 L.Ed. 734.

Personal and property rights

It is not the criminality of the act that gives jurisdiction in equity, but the deprivation of personal and property rights interfered with, injured, destroyed, or taken away by the unlawful act.

on which the suit is based contains a provision for its enforcement by injunction.[5] In granting the injunction the court acts solely for the purpose of protecting property rights from damage and in no way interferes with the enforcement of the criminal laws.[6] The remedy given is purely preventive; defendant is not punished for what he has done; this is left to the criminal courts.[7] Private persons may not resort to equity to prevent criminal acts unless they are threatened with irreparable injury to their property[8] distinct from that suffered by the public generally,[9] and the relief must be such as only equity can give.[10]

§ 152. —— Affecting Public Property or Rights

Injunction will issue to protect public rights, property, or welfare notwithstanding the acts enjoined may also constitute crimes.

Where an injunction is necessary for the protection of public rights, property or welfare, the criminality of the acts complained of does not bar the remedy by injunction,[11] and the court will consider the criminality of the act only to determine whether, under the particular circumstances, equitable intervention is necessary.[12] Such an injunction ought not to be granted, however, except for the prevention of serious and irreparable injury,[13] and cannot be demanded as a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of the court.[14] For a discussion of equitable relief against nuisances see the C.J.S. title Nuisances §§ 109–138, also 46 C.J. p 759 note 75–p 802 note 44.

In supreme court
A wrong arising out of repeated violations of a penal statute and

§ 153. Criminal Conspiracies and Combinations

A criminal conspiracy threatening irreparable injury to the property of a complainant who has no other available remedy may be enjoined.

A criminal conspiracy or combination which threatens the property of complainant with irreparable injury may be enjoined, where complainant has no other available remedy.[15] In order for an injunction to issue, however, the thing which is done or is threatened must in itself be unlawful, or, if lawful, it must be carried out by unlawful means.[16]

§ 154. Preventing Enforcement of Rights Acquired by Crime

The prevention of enforcement of rights acquired by crime is discussed supra § 32.

§ 155. Other Acts

The rule that injunction will not issue to restrain criminal acts unless necessary to protect civil or property rights has been widely applied.

The general rule, discussed supra § 150, that injunction will not issue to restrain criminal acts has been widely applied, and courts have refused to grant injunctions to restrain the erection of a livery stable in a city;[17] to restrain the maintenance of a slaughterhouse on a stream flowing through a city;[18] to restrain the permitting of stock and cattle to run at large within the city limits;[19] to harmfully affecting the rights and interests of people generally throughout the state, when committed by a corporation engaged in the public service, is a public wrong which, under some state constitutions, may be enjoined by the supreme court in an original suit in equity wherein the state is plaintiff.—State v. Ak-Sar-Ben Exposition Co., 226 N.W. 705, 118 Neb. 851.

Publication

Although a publication cannot be enjoined solely because of its libelous character, where it threatens irreparable injury to property rights and other grounds of equitable jurisdiction exist it will be enjoined, regardless of its character as libelous or otherwise.—Ex parte Wood, 227 P. 908, 194 Cal. 49.

To violate injunctions

An action for injunction against alleged conspiracy by defendants to violate injunctions was not precluded by availability to plaintiff of contempt proceedings for violation of the injunctions.—LaFrance v. LaFrance, 14 A.2d 739, 127 Conn. 149.

State was not precluded from maintaining suit to enjoin conspiracy not to pay a tax and make reports as required by statute, on ground that state was not damaged, where state was hindered in collection of funds and penalty imposed for failure to pay, and was put to trouble and expense of filing suit, and by conspiracy of defendants others were encouraged not to pay such tax.—State ex rel. Rice v. Hasson Grocery Co., 170 So. 234, 177 Miss. 264, 107 A.L.R. 663.

Defenses

In action against labor union to restrain conspiracy to ruin plaintiff's business, alleged violation of constitutional rights of third persons was not defense for defendant union, even though some of third parties were members of union; nor was complainant's alleged fraud in procuring Blue Eagle.—J. & T. Cousins Co. v. Shoe & Leather Workers' Industrial Union of New York, 268 N.Y.S. 547, 150 Misc. 575, affirmed 270 N.Y.S. 973, 241 App.Div. 760.

restrain the transactions of banking business in contravention of law;[20] to restrain a violation of city ordinances, where the acts complained of do not amount to such a nuisance as equity would restrain;[21] to restrain the violation of civil rights statutes which provide both a civil and criminal remedy for their violation;[22] to restrain the violation of a statute prohibiting certain aliens from possessing realty;[23] to restrain the violation of a statute limiting the hours of work on public improvements;[24] to restrain the violation of liquor laws;[25] to restrain the violation of a statute declaring that navigable waters belong to the people as a common for fowling;[26] to restrain the violation of a statute requiring the manufacturer and seller of an article of food or drink to furnish samples of the article manufactured or sold for analysis;[27] to restrain violations of licensing statutes,[28] and to restrain the violation of Sunday laws.[29] It has also been held that injunction will not lie to restrain the keeping of a gambling house,[30] a bucket shop,[31] or a bawdyhouse,[32] no special injury to plaintiff's property rights being shown, or to restrain gambling on public fair grounds,[33] or the maintenance of a race track and poolroom,[34] or to prevent a prize fight[35] or the carrying on of the business of knowingly purchasing stolen ores from plaintiff's employees,[36] although there is also authority directly to the contrary of this last proposition.[37]

acts will result in depriving another of his property;[43] to prevent the serving of liquor by a lodge to its members in violation of an ordinance;[44] and to prevent the use of force and violence to prevent complainant from working land where the result would be that, if the land were not planted at that time, no crop could be raised thereon during the season.[45]

Zoning laws. In a number of jurisdictions the courts have refused to grant injunctions to restrain the erection or location of wooden buildings within the fire limits of a municipality,[46] but there is also authority to the contrary,[47] at least where ordinance does not furnish a full, complete, and adequate remedy.[48] Where the remedy by continuous prosecutions is adequate, injunction will be denied.[49] Where the remedy by prosecution for violations of a zoning law or ordinance is adequate, it has been held that a violation will not be restrained,[50] but injunctions have been granted to restrain violations of zoning ordinances,[51] particularly where such remedy is made available by statute.[52] Property owners cannot maintain suit to restrain an adjacent owner's violation of a zoning ordinance unless their personal or property rights will be injured[53] and unless there is no other available remedy.[54] The legality of the zoning law must be established before a violation thereof will be enjoined.[55]

I. CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS, ARRESTS, AND JUDGMENTS

§ 156. In General

As a general rule, an injunction will not be granted to stay criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings.

The general rule, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, is that an injunction will not be granted to stay criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings, whether the prosecution is for the violation of the common law or the infraction of statutes or municipal ordinances,[56] or to stay the enforcement of

To prevent admission of evidence

Where evidence is legally competent, the fact that it was obtained unlawfully, in violation of plaintiff's rights, does not warrant injunctive relief to prevent its admission in a criminal prosecution against plaintiff.—Fusaro v. McKennell, 198 N.Y.S. 719, 120 Misc. 434.

Probability of erroneous decision

Probability that judge of county court would render erroneous decision would not authorize circuit court to enjoin him from proceeding with prosecution under warrants for failing to work public road.—Pelfry v. Spencer, 265 S.W. 4, 204 Ky. 578.

Searches

(1) Owners of premises were not entitled to injunction restraining interference by police officers in respect of searches of premises.

N.Y.—Kalwin Business Men's Ass'n v. McLaughlin, 214 N.Y.S. 99, 126 Misc. 698, reversed on other grounds 214 N.Y.S. 507, 216 App. Div. 6.

(2) Equity would not enjoin city officials from molesting the operation of a "bank night" in theater or from making searches and seizures, or enjoin individual and his attorney from filing affidavits for searches for, and seizures of, "bank night" equipment.—Troy Amusement Co. v. Attenweiler, 28 N.E.2d 207, 64 Ohio App. 105, affirmed 30 N.E.2d 799, 137 Ohio St. 460.

Seizure or forfeiture of property

(1) An injunction will not lie to restrain proceedings which have for their object the seizure or forfeiture of property used in violation of law.—State v. Carroll, 279 P. 234, 85 Mont. 439.

(2) The giving of notice by police to persons in possession of machines in violation of gambling statute that continued unlawful possession and use would subject them to seizure and forfeiture as prescribed by statute was not unlawful action authorizing issuance of restraining order against police officials from further proceeding under statute.—Conte v. Roberts, 192 A. 814, 58 R.I. 353.

(3) Where pinball machines might have been gaming devices, the owner and distributor was not entitled to injunctive relief as against officers seeking seizure of machines, on ground that machines were not gaming devices and were to be used for amusement purposes only.—Earhart v. Young, 124 S.W.2d 693, 174 Tenn. 198.

(4) However, absence of evidence that liquor-laden vessel seized on high seas was unlawfully engaged was held to warrant injunction against institution of any proceedings against it, or its cargo, master, or crew.—The Evelyn D., D.C.Ga., 14 F.2d 321.

Construction of statute

Statute providing that equity will neither aid criminal courts in exercise of jurisdiction, nor restrain them, does not imply that court is without jurisdiction to render judgment in suit to restrain enforcement of criminal law, but provides that equity will take no part in administration of criminal law.—McCullough Bros. v. City of Griffin, 184 S.E. 599, 181 Ga. 832.

32 C.J. p 280 note 57.

58. State not made party defendant

The reason for the rule that court cannot enjoin the enforcement of criminal law by interference with an illegal business is not based on any distinction between powers of courts of law as distinguished from courts of equity, but is that criminal prosecution is carried on in the name of the people, and the state may not be made a party defendant.—Kent v. City of Chicago, 22 N.E.2d 799, 301 Ill.App. 312.

No interference with public

As a matter of public policy the court should not interfere with the rights of the public seeking the enforcement of the law.—Foley v. Ham, 169 P. 183, 102 Kan. 66, L.R.A.1918C 204.

is intended to supplement, and not usurp, the functions of the courts of law,[60] and on the fact that the party has an adequate remedy at law[61] by establishing as a defense to the prosecution that he did not commit the act charged,[62] or that the statute or ordinance on which the prosecution is based is invalid,[63] and, in case of conviction, by taking an appeal.[64]

Application and extent of rule. The rule applies whether the prosecution is by indictment or by summary process,[65] and applies to prosecutions which are merely threatened or anticipated as well as to those which have already been commenced,[66] and also to grand jury investigations.[67] In the absence of other circumstances justifying interference by a court of equity, the rule also applies, even though the ordinance or statute on which the prosecution is based is void,[68] although the party seeking the in-

Previous conviction or indictment
The fact that indictments were pending against certain of those being investigated by the grand jury would not require the enjoining of the grand jury investigation by the federal district court, and there was no question of previous conviction, previous acquittal, or res judicata, since a grand jury investigation is an ex parte proceeding and the grand jury merely makes an accusation.—Application of Texas Co., supra.

junction is not guilty of a violation of the ordinance or statute;[69] although the complaint states no cause of action;[70] although the municipality, under the authority of which prosecutions under an alleged void ordinance are to be instituted, and its officers proceeding therein are insolvent so that damages cannot be recovered from them;[71] although the fact that the fines to which the party may be subjected if found guilty amount to less than will permit an appeal;[72] or although the statute on which the prosecution is based is not enforced against some violators.[73]

Erroneous interpretation of statute. It is not a ground for injunctive relief that the prosecuting officer has erroneously construed the statute on which the prosecution is based so as to include the act or acts which it is the purpose of the prosecution to punish.[74]

Motives of the officers instituting the prosecution are immaterial.[75]

Offense malum prohibitum not malum in se. The fact that the operation of the act in question amounts to a crime which is only such because it is prohibited and may not in itself indicate moral depravity does not in any way affect the operation of this rule.[76]

Injury to business or property. If the statute, or interpretation thereof, on which the prosecution is based is valid, the fact that the enforcement thereof would materially injure complainant's business or property constitutes no ground for equitable interference,[77] and is not sufficient reason for asking a court of equity to ascertain in advance whether the business as conducted is in violation of a penal statute, and to enjoin a prosecution thereunder.[78]

Waiver of want of jurisdiction. It is not within the power of the parties to waive the question relating to the jurisdiction of the court and to compel it to try the cause.[79]

§ 157. Exceptions to Rule

a. In general
b. Vexatious prosecutions; multiplicity
c. Suit relating to same matters pending in equity

a. In General

Injunction to restrain criminal proceeding may issue when the circumstances are exceptional and the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate as where the criminal law is used as a club to take or injure private property.

An exception to the general rule, stated supra § 156, exists when the circumstances are exceptional and the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate,[80] or when the criminal law is used as a club to take or injure private property,[81] or where a statute authorizes injunctive relief.[82] Also, unlawful proceedings in a criminal prosecution may be restrained.[83]

b. Vexatious Prosecutions; Multiplicity

While there is some authority to the contrary, injunction may issue to restrain a criminal prosecution for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits, especially where such prosecutions would be vexatious and oppressive.

In some cases an exception to the general rule has been made on the ground that the prosecutions sought to be enjoined were vexatious and oppressive,[84] as where the statute or ordinance, whose enforcement is sought, imposes such restrictive or cumulative penalties that the persons affected are practically prevented from resorting to the courts to determine the validity or the applicability of the law.[85] Further, it has even been held or said in some decisions that, where prosecutions under an invalid law are vexatious and oppressive, they may be enjoined, even though no property rights are involved,[86] and even though no property rights are threatened.[87]

It has also been held that an injunction will be granted to stay a criminal prosecution where the validity of a statute or ordinance is involved, for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits,[88] especially where the prosecutions would be vexa-

Maintenance of status quo

Order restraining state tax officials from interfering with certain cigarette purchasers in collecting cigarette tax was not void as attempt to prevent enforcement of criminal laws, since it was merely to maintain status quo until final hearing could be had.—Ex parte Kimberlin, 86 S.W.2d 717, 126 Tex. 60.

82. Construction or validity of statute

Under a statute providing that any person interested under a deed, etc., or whose rights, status, or other legal relations are affected by a statute, municipal ordinance, contract, or franchise, may have determined any question of construction or validity arising thereunder, it has been held that injunction may issue to restrain the enforcement of an ordinance and to have it declared void.—Webber v. City of Scottsbluff, 3 N.W.2d 635, 141 Neb. 363.

83. Unlawful appeal

An application to a coördinate term of the supreme court by special assistant attorney general for an order directing that petitioner be tried together with several other defendants was in effect an unlawful appeal from an order of severance of the special term, and would be restrained.—People ex rel. Indictments involving different defendants

An injunction will not issue to enjoin prosecution of indictments, involving different defendants but similar questions of law, on the ground of prevention of multiplicity of suits.—U. S. v. Buck, D.C.Mo., 18 F.Supp. 213, affirmed, C.C.A., Walker v. U. S., 93 F.2d 383, certiorari denied 58 S. Ct. 642, 303 U.S. 644, 82 L.Ed. 1103, rehearing denied 58 S.Ct. 755, 303 U.S. 668, 82 L.Ed. 1124, certiorari denied Drummond v. U. tious and oppressive,[89] or an invasion of complainant's property rights.[90] However, it has also been held that an injunction will be denied, where sought on the ground of avoidance of a multiplicity of suits,[91] at least where there has been no adjudication in a law court concerning the legality or illegality of the statute or conduct on which such proceedings are based.[92]

c. Suit Relating to Same Matters Pending in Equity

Injunction may issue to restrain a criminal prosecution begun while there is pending in equity a suit to try the same right between the same parties.

Another exception to the general rule is that a court of equity will restrain a criminal prosecution begun while there is pending in equity a suit to try the same right between the same parties.[93] It has been stated that this rule is limited to cases where the parties sought to be enjoined have as plaintiffs submitted themselves to the court in the equity proceeding.[94] The suit must be pending in equity when the injunction is sought,[95] and the subject matter of the two proceedings must be identical.[96]

§ 158. —— Invalidity of Statute or Ordinance

Generally where criminal proceedings would involve a direct invasion of property rights and result in irreparable injury thereto, an injunction may be granted to restrain such proceedings based either on an unconstitutional or otherwise invalid statute or ordinance, or on a misinterpretation of a valid law if, at least as so interpreted, the law would be invalid.

As an exception to the general rule, stated supra § 156, it is quite generally held that, where the proceedings would involve a direct invasion of property rights and result in irreparable injury thereto, an injunction may be granted to restrain criminal proceedings based either on an unconstitutional or otherwise invalid statute or ordinance,[97] or on a misinterpretation of a valid law if, at least as so

Declaratory proceeding

Ordinarily, equity will not entertain a proceeding to enjoin the enforcement of a penal statute, but this rule is subject to an exception in favor of a declaratory proceeding to test validity of a criminal statute which affects one in his trade, business, or occupation, although such an action will not operate to stay enforcement of statute during pendency thereof.—Doyle v. Clark, 41 N.E.2d 949, 220 Ind. 271.

Pending prosecutions not enjoined

It has been broadly stated or held that a pending prosecution will not be restrained by injunction.

prosecutions under invalid orders of boards or commissions.[1] Under these circumstances, the injunction is not merely to enjoin a criminal proceeding,[2] but is simply incidental to the main grounds of equitable jurisdiction to protect property rights from threatened irreparable and unlawful injury,[3] and this jurisdiction is not ousted by the fact that the state had chosen to assert its power to enforce the law by indictment or other criminal proceedings.[4] Nevertheless, the mere invalidity of an ordinance under which prosecutions are brought, without additional circumstances bringing the case under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction, affords no ground for the issuance of an injunction to restrain such prosecution;[5] and there must be an impending or imminent prosecution[6] and the threatened injury to property rights must be one naturally and necessarily growing out of the threatened prosecution.[7] In order to be entitled to an injunction, both invalidity of the statute and irreparable injury are indispensable.[8] Thus, as shown supra § 156, the general rule applies notwithstanding the statute or ordinance is invalid, and similarly, if the law is valid, the fact that enforcement thereof will materially injure complainant's business or property constitutes no ground for equitable interference. Irreparable injury must be clearly shown;[9] and it is not sufficient that the injury or loss to plaintiff's business or rights of property would be only such as would incidentally flow from the arrest and prosecution thereunder,[10] as courts will not interfere by injunction where the injury inflicted or threatened is merely the vexation of arrest and punishment of complainant who is left free to litigate the questions of unconstitutionality of the statute or ordinance or its construction or application in making his defense at the trial or prosecution for its violation.[11] Further, injunction will not lie where there is a remedy

by defense on the prosecution or by an action for damages.[12] It is also necessary to show that the probable and direct injury to property is entirely distinct from the proceedings to punish personally for the commission of the offense.[13]

Under statute declared invalid. Prosecution under a statute which had been declared invalid by a higher court or court of last resort may be enjoined[14] as where the purpose is expressed by a citizen instituting such prosecutions to continue such prosecutions indefinitely and in large numbers if money unlawfully demanded by him is not paid.[15]

§ 159. Particular Prosecutions

In accordance with the general rule, injunction to restrain criminal prosecutions under various statutes and ordinances has been refused.

In accordance with the rules, stated supra § 156, it has been held that an injunction does not lie to restrain a prosecution for a violation of statutes or ordinances: Forbidding property owners to permit shade trees to project on sidewalks;[16] forbidding the use of certain apparatus for testing the quality of milk by any person who has not obtained a license;[17] making it an offense to fish with a seine of more than fifty feet in the lakes and bayous of a parish where plaintiff had no vested or proprietary right to take fish from such lakes and bayous;[18] prohibiting the carrying on of a designated business within certain limits in the municipality;[19] prohibiting telegraph companies from knowingly receiving for transmission messages relating to futures or furnishing leased wires for that purpose;[20] prohibiting gaming[21] or the playing of pool in social clubs;[22] prohibiting the obstruction of streets;[23] regulating the occupation of a tunnel;[24] regulating private banking;[25] regulating or prohibiting traffic in intoxicating liquors;[26] requiring a citizen to perform road duty or pay a fixed sum;[27] requiring hackney carriers to be numbered;[28] requiring the payment to road commissioners of a compensation tax or to appear at the time and place appointed to work;[29] or requiring persons engaged in certain lines of business to take out licenses[30] or to pay an occupa-

Ordinarily, an injunction will not issue to restrain officers from making an arrest for an alleged violation of law.

An injunction will not issue to restrain officers from making an arrest for an alleged violation of law,[39] and it is immaterial that the party asserts his innocence,[40] or that the officers are mistaken in their opinion as to what constitutes a crime.[41] The appropriate remedy in case the arrest is unlawful is by action for damages against the individual officers,[42] or by indictment.[43]

Also, repeated arrests, or threats thereof, for failure to observe exactions of a valid ordinance will not be restrained by injunction,[44] but in the case of repeated arrests indicating a purpose to persecute an innocent person, an injunction will be granted.[45]

Where irreparable injury to property rights certainly will accompany or result from an arrest which is illegal, complainant may be entitled to injunctive relief.[46]

IV. APPLICATIONS AND SUITS FOR INJUNCTION

A. IN GENERAL

§ 162. Nature, Form, and Scope of Action or Proceeding

A suit for injunction is a civil suit, governed by rules of procedure applicable to other civil suits; more particularly, it is an equitable remedy, and governed by the rules of procedure governing equity proceedings generally. It is an action in personam and not an action in rem.

A suit for an injunction is a civil suit, and is controlled and limited by the rules of procedure and statutes applicable to other civil suits.[50] More particularly, an injunction suit is one of equity,[51] and the principles, practice, and procedure governing courts of equity are, under statutory provisions in some jurisdictions, made to govern proceedings in injunctions.[52]

The remedies of injunction and specific performance are compared supra § 79.

Action in personam. A suit for an injunction is an action in personam,[53] and not an action in rem.[54]

As separate or ancillary proceeding. Where it is sought to restrain an action at law, the prevailing practice is for the defendants in the law action to ask for the preliminary injunction in a separate suit, rather than in the law action;[55] but it has also been held that, where an injunction is sought to stay a proceeding pending before the same court, the injunction proceeding is regarded as ancillary to the pending proceeding, and not as a separate suit.[56]

§ 163. Rights of Action

The question of the right to maintain a suit for an injunction is in general considered in connection with the discussion of the subjects of protection and relief supra §§ 36–161, and the question of what persons are entitled to sue is treated generally supra § 35.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 164. Conditions Precedent in General

Any condition imposed by statute as to the maintenance of suit must be complied with.

Conditions to the right to injunctive relief, as distinguished from conditions precedent to the right to sue, are considered in connection with the discussion of the subjects of protection and relief supra §§ 36–161.

Under a statute so providing, before a temporary injunction may be granted an affidavit must be filed stating that the injunction had not previously been refused by the court or any judge;[57] but under or apart from such statute such affidavit has been held not to be required as a condition precedent to the granting of a final injunction.[58]

Law of state

Possessory action

An action wherein plaintiff seeks to restrain the defendant from trespassing on, and taking possession of, his property, without praying for recognition as owner of the property, is not a petitory action but a possessory action, within the terms of a statute setting out the elements of such actions.—Collins v. McLemore, La.App., 177 So. 502, followed in McLemore v. Collins, 177 So. 506.

Whether or not injunction is a possessory remedy is considered supra § 52.

a. As Condition of Granting Permanent Injunction

A bond is not in the absence of statute required as a condition of granting a permanent injunction.

An injunction bond is not in the absence of statute required as a condition of granting a permanent injunction;[59] and statutes requiring a bond have no application to final injunctions which settle conclusively the rights of the parties, leaving no question of future damages.[60]

b. As Condition of Granting Restraining Order

Authorities differ as to whether, under a statute requiring a bond in the case of an injunction, a bond or undertaking is required as a condition of granting a restraining order.

In some states in which an undertaking is expressly required as a condition of issuing an injunction, a distinction is made between injunctions and restraining orders, and no bond is required before issuing a restraining order;[61] but even in these jurisdictions it is proper for the court in its discretion to require a bond.[62]

In other jurisdictions, unless the case falls within one of the contemplated exceptions to the statutory requirement,[63] a bond is required for a restraining order either under statutes expressly so providing or under the statutes as to injunctions.[64] However, while it has been held that the court has no power to grant a restraining order in the first instance and then allow time in which to file the bond,[65] it has also been held that such an order is not void, but the bond may be furnished subsequently and the order validated as of that time.[66]

(a) Statutory Requirements

In general, under statutes to that effect, a bond is required as a condition of granting a preliminary injunction.

Under the codes and statutes of most states expressly so providing, it is generally held that, except where the case falls within one of the exceptions to the statute,[67] a bond is required as a condition of granting a preliminary injunction, either in all or in designated classes of injunction suits.[68] Under these statutes it has been held that a bond is necessary whether the injunctional order is made on an ex parte application or on an order to show cause previously made,[69] whether an injunction is the main purpose of the bill or is merely ancillary thereto,[70] and whether the injunction is granted by

In Louisiana

(1) Under statute so providing, when a defendant in executory proceedings for the seizure and sale of mortgaged property sets up a plea in compensation of the debt, and makes the requisite affidavit, he is entitled to a preliminary injunction, as of right and without a bond.—Newman v. Frevlin, 7 So. 799, 42 La. Ann. 720.

(2) But where an application for injunction does not come within the purview of the statute relative to enjoining executory process in certain instances, the issuing of a restraining order without bond pending the court's determination whether it will grant the preliminary injunction prayed for is unauthorized.—Meine v. New Orleans, 89 So. 882, 149 La. 640.

Giving of bond as condition of refusing injunction see infra § 202.

Construction

The provision of the National Labor Relations Act for giving of bond as condition of issuance of temporary restraining order or injunction should be liberally construed to accomplish its purpose.—Houston & North Texas Motor Freight Lines v. Local No. 745, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers of America, D.C.Tex., 27 F.Supp. 262.

Duration of liability

Where temporary injunction is granted, court, in entering decree on merits granting permanent injunction, may properly discharge sureties on bond for temporary injunction from further liability, but, where decree is reversed on appeal, bond for temporary injunction remains in force until final decree determining whether plaintiffs were entitled to temporary injunction.—Weaver v. Bishop, 52 P.2d 853, 174 Okl. 492.

Ex parte writs

Statutes making a bond a prerequisite to the issuance of a writ of injunction have been held to refer to temporary writs of injunction, granted ex parte.—Oak Downs, Inc. v. Schmid, Tex.Civ.App., 95 S.W.2d 1040, reversed on other grounds 97 S.W.2d 671, 128 Tex. 214.

In surrogate's courts

Surrogate's power to issue injunction for protection of decedent's estate is no broader than power of supreme court, and requires security. —In re Ashner's Estate, 246 N.Y.S. 129, 231 App.Div. 127.

the court on application therefor or on its own motion;[71] and it has been held that statutes authorizing suits in forma pauperis do not obviate the necessity of giving bond,[72] as the statutes do not embrace injunctions.[73]

The statutes have no application to injunctions issued by the court, in lieu of proceedings for contempt of court, to prevent the impairment and defeat of the just exercise of its undoubted jurisdiction to protect and enforce its lawful orders and to preserve the title made by it under these orders,[74] although the court may require a bond to be filed in such case;[75] nor do they apply to an injunction restraining all actions against an insolvent company or interference with its assets until further order of court, where such injunction is incidental to a receivership.[76] It has been held that a bond is not required where an injunction, against the collection of a judgment, was only to prohibit the parties from violating the terms of a contract executed after the judgment, so that the court's jurisdiction to issue the injunction is found in the terms of the contract.[77] It has also been held that a bond is not required where property rights are not involved and cannot be impaired or otherwise affected.[78]

Restraining proceedings at law. Under the provisions of many statutes an injunction may not be granted to restrain proceedings at law unless a bond is given;[79] but injunctions granted simply to restrain the forced sale of property claimed to be exempt from sale under the constitution of a state are not injunctions to stay proceedings at law within the meaning of such a statute.[80]

Mandatory character of statute. Statutes providing for the giving of a bond as security for the issuance of an injunction usually are mandatory in character and are so construed;[81] and, where this is the case, the court cannot dispense with the filing of a bond as preliminary to the issuance of a temporary injunction.[82] However, as appears infra subdivision a (1) (b) of this section, under some statutes the requirement of a bond is a matter for the court's discretion.

However, it has been held that, in a proceeding for contempt in preparing to sell land under deed of trust pending suit to cancel the secured notes, the court had adequate power to protect its jurisdiction without granting a temporary injunction, and its doing so, without requiring the statutory bond, petition, or affidavit, as required by statute, was an abuse of discretion.—American Rio Grande Land & Irrigation Co. v. (b) Discretion and Power of Court

Apart from statutes, and under statutes to that effect, whether a bond must be given as a condition of granting the injunction is a matter for the discretion of the court.

If there is no statute requiring bond, or if the statute providing for bond expressly or by implication confers discretion on the courts in enforcing the provisions thereof, the giving of a bond is not an absolute condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction, and the court may or may not require a bond as in its discretion it sees fit.[83] However, under statute to that effect, a sufficient showing of the facts constituting good cause why the bond is not necessary in the discretion of the court, judge, or master must be set forth in the record;[84] and a mere recital of a finding of good cause is insufficient.[85]

On the other hand, it has been held that before requiring a bond the court must be reasonably certain that a genuine danger of loss and injury exists and that injustice may follow the denial of an application to require the furnishing of a bond.[86] It has been held to be within the discretion of the court to grant an injunction without a bond in a case where the public interest is involved.[87]

The court's order requiring a bond must give the party seeking the injunction the option of taking it on the condition imposed or of refusing it.[88]

Power of court to require bond. As appears infra, § 202, a court may impose any legal conditions it deems just in granting an injunction; and there is no question that, independent of any statutory provision on the subject, courts of equity have the power, on application for a preliminary injunction, to require from complainant a bond to indemnify defendant against whom the injunction is sought, as a condition precedent to granting the injunction,[89] whether the injunction is granted on notice or in the absence of notice;[90] and it has been held, apart from statute, that no preliminary injunction should issue without security to the party enjoined,[91] in

86. To protect party not enjoined
Since it is unlikely that a party who is not enjoined will suffer loss or be greatly inconvenienced by the injunction, the court should be satisfied that the application by such party is not merely a move to harass the party seeking the injunction.—Witbeck v. Origin of rule
(1) In the early stages of equity jurisprudence temporary injunctions were often issued simply on an ex parte showing by plaintiff, without requiring any bond or other security, and if on a final hearing it transpired that the injunction was issued without just cause, and it was therefore dissolved, the party enjoined could not recover damages occasioned thereby either in an action at law or a suit in equity, unless it was shown that the injunction was sued out through malice and without probable cause; in other words, the only relief for injury, however grievous or oppressive, which defendant had on defeating a wrongful writ of injunction was an action as in other cases for malicious prosecution, to sustain which it was necessary to allege and prove that the injunction was sued out through malice and without probable cause.—State v. Atcherson, 24 Ohio N.P., N.S., 265—32 C.J. p 310 note 2.
(2) The injustice which so often resulted from hasty and unfounded orders for injunction, for the consequences of which the courts alone were responsible under the law, induced them to adopt as far as was in their power such measures and safeguards as might afford defendant an indemnity against loss and injury from injunctions which ought never to have been granted; hence arose the doctrine which recognized in courts of equity the inherent power of exacting bonds from plaintiff before awarding him an injunction, which should in one way or another indemnify defendant for damages suffered by him in consequence of the process discontinued or dissolved by the court at final hearing.—St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 82 Mo. 349—32 C.J. p 310 note 5.

the absence of a specific showing of some good and sufficient cause why security for the protection of the enjoined defendant should not be exacted in accordance with the prevailing equity practice.[92]

(2) Other Security

The courts may provide for any adequate method of protecting the party against whom an injunction is sought.

In addition to the power to require a bond as a condition of granting a preliminary injunction, discussed supra subdivision a (1) (b) of this section, the courts may provide for any other adequate method of protecting the party against whom the injunction is granted if it is improvidently issued;[93] and it has been held in general terms that the courts may require security to protect the defendant in case the complainant ultimately fails.[94] In some cases the courts have dispensed with the necessity of giving a formal injunction bond and imposed as a condition for the granting of the injunction that complainant shall pay any damages sustained by defendant in case it be determined that the injunction should not have issued; and in such case, if complainant avails himself of the writ, he is bound by the condition, and on dissolution of the injunction damages may be awarded defendant.[95] In other cases it has been held proper to require plaintiff to make a deposit in court instead of giving a bond.[96]

b. Purpose

The purpose of an injunction bond is to secure the defendant against damages if the injunction was improvidently issued.

An injunction bond is intended as security for damages suffered by defendant in case it is finally decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted.[97] It is designed to indemnify against immediate and actual loss, but not against remote injuries.[98]

The liability imported by an injunction bond would seem to depend on the purpose of the injunction proceedings in which it was given, for, where the bond is given to secure an injunction of a judgment, the obligor will be liable for the amount of the judgment;[99] but, where a bond is given to obtain an injunction against the sale of property to enforce a debt, the purpose of the bond is to secure the party enjoined against any loss that may be suffered because of the holding up of the sale, and not to secure such party for the amount of the debt;[1] and the bond ordinarily does not have any limiting effect on the amount of a debt, the present and immediate collection of which has been restrained by the injunction.[2]

c. Parties from Whom Required

Under or apart from statutes to that effect, certain parties, such as municipal corporations, public officers, states, and the United States, ordinarily are not required to furnish an injunction bond.

In some states, under or apart from statutes to that effect, certain parties are not required to give security as a condition to the granting of an injunction.[3] Thus it has been held that a municipal corporation is not required to give a bond[4] and the exemption has been applied to public officers.[5] Under statute with respect to bonds in judicial proceedings generally, boards and commissions which exercise public functions may not be required to furnish bond for a restraining order.[6]

States. While in some jurisdictions statutes requiring the giving of a bond as a condition to the allowance of an injunction are held to apply to the state as well as to other suitors,[7] the contrary view is more commonly held, under or apart from statutes providing that the state is not required to furnish a bond in any proceeding,[8] although it has been held that it is within the power of the chancellor to require a bond, notwithstanding plaintiff in the action is the state.[9] In some jurisdictions the statutes requiring bond expressly except the state from their operation,[10] provided, however, that the suit is instituted by the state in its own behalf.[11]

The United States may sue for an injunction without giving a bond as a private suitor must do.[12]

In England, where a suit is brought in behalf of the crown in which application is made for a preliminary injunction, it is not according to the ordinary practice of the court to require any undertaking as to damages to be given as a condition of obtaining the injunction.[13]

Citizen or taxpayer. The statutes requiring a bond where an injunction or restraining order is sought have been held to apply where a private citizen or taxpayer sues to restrain a violation of a statute, even though a bond would not have been required had the suit been brought by a state agency, or by an authorized public officer in his official capacity;[14] but there is also some authority to the contrary.[15]

3. In court's discretion

Under statute to that effect, the court has the power to grant an injunction without requiring bond where the person to whom the injunction is granted is a person from whom, in the opinion of the court or judge awarding the same, it may be improper to require bond; but such exception should ordinarily be limited to a personal representative or some other person suing in a similar representative capacity.—Deeds v. 11. To protect private property rights

Injunction "suits instituted by state in its own behalf" in which bond is unnecessary are those in which public rights or interests are involved; and injunction suits filed in state's name against sewer district on behalf of taxpayers to protect their property rights were not "suits instituted by state in its own behalf," and bonds were required.—State ex rel. Statute not repealed

Statute exempting government from giving bond for injunction in federal court proceedings was held not impliedly repealed by statute prohibiting issuance of injunctions without bond.—U. S. v. McIntosh, D. C.Va., 57 F.2d 573.

Need for injunction

United States was held entitled to injunction without bond against prosecution of ejectment suit against officers thereof in state court for possession of land condemned for marine corps base as against contention that bill showed no real need for injunction.—U. S. v. McIntosh, supra.

14. Fla.—Merryman v. Southern Tours, 162 So. 897, 120 Fla. 440.

15. Statute requiring hearing

Statute permitting private citizen to maintain suit to enjoin use of premises for gambling without showing that he was injured by such use was held not to require such citizen to give injunction bond, since statute making bond a prerequisite to issuance of injunction related to temporary writs of injunction granted ex parte under general injunction statute, and not to writ granted under statute permitting private citizen to maintain suit, and did not apply where defendants were accorded full hearing and were adjudged guilty of maintaining a nuisance.—Oak Downs, Inc. v. Schmid, Civ.App., 95 S.W.2d 1040, reversed on other grounds 97 S.W.2d 671, 128 Tex. 214.

Administrators or other fiduciaries. In some cases, statutes with reference to bonds as a condition to the issuance of an injunction have been held to embrace executors, administrators, and other fiduciaries.[16] In others the contrary has been held.[17]

Receivers. It is erroneous to grant an injunction at the suit of a receiver without requiring him to give the usual injunction bond, and the bond given by him, as a receiver for the purpose of his general duties, is not sufficient.[18]

Person not a party to legal proceedings. A bond is required for a temporary injunction to enjoin pending legal proceedings even where the one seeking the injunction is not a party to the legal proceedings.[19]

Exempt and nonexempt parties joined. Parties who are exempt, under or apart from statute, from the requirement of furnishing bond as a condition of granting an injunction do not lose their exemption because of their joinder, as coplaintiffs, with other parties who are not exempt;[20] and, conversely, even though one of the parties seeking the injunction is not required under the statute to give bond, the other parties will not thereby be exempted from the requirement.[21]

d. Consideration

No consideration is necessary where an injunction bond is required by statute; but a bond may be void for lack of consideration where it is not required by statute.

In accordance with the rules governing the necessity of consideration for bonds generally, discussed in Bonds §§ 22, 23, where an injunction bond is required by statute as a condition of the issuance of a preliminary injunction no consideration for the bond is necessary;[22] but an injunction bond, not required by statute, may be void for want of consideration.[23]

It is the stoppage or suspension of the acts sought to be enjoined which constitutes the consideration for the bond,[24] so that a bond is supported by consideration even though the injunction was signed before the bond was filed.[25]

(1) In General

Where conditions are prescribed by statute, the bond must conform to the statutory requirements, although substantial compliance is sufficient. In the absence of statute prescribing conditions, the conditions are within the sound discretion of the court.

Where the statutes requiring a bond as a condition precedent to an order of injunction prescribe conditions of such bond, the bond must conform in terms or substantially to the statutory requirements;[26] but a bond in substantial compliance with the statute is valid.[27] It has been held that a bond,

Special statute
General statute relating to injunctions is inapplicable in determining necessity of bond as condition to temporary injunction pending application for receiver's appointment, where a special statute relating to that question exists; and a special statute requiring bond was held mandatory.—Truesdell v. Johnson, 142 S.E. 343, 144 S.C. 188.

In the case of an injunction against a judgment, the suspension and delay of execution to be produced by the injunction have been held to be, prima facie at least, a sufficient consideration for the execution of the bond.—Mahan v. Tydings, 10 B.Mon., Ky., 351—32 C.J. p 314 note 48.

Claim and delivery bond
An undertaking in the form of a statutory claim and delivery bond, which contains no reference to any promise or obligation on the part of plaintiff or his surety that he or it will pay to the party enjoined such damages as may be sustained by reason of the injunction, does not meet the statutory requirements of an injunction bond.—Lamb v. National Surety Co., 291 P. 647, 108 Cal. App. 297.

Bond for judgment and damages
Court was unauthorized to compel plaintiff to furnish bond requiring bondsmen to pay defendant such sum as may be determined to be payable by reason of defendant's judgment, plus damages.—Cockerham v. First Nat. Bank, 297 P. 363, 136 Or. 176.

27. Ky.—Strong v. Duff, 15 S.W.2d defective in not securing the damages according to the conditions prescribed in the statute, is ground for dissolving the injunction, although not for dismissing the bill.[28] It has been held that, although the conditions of an injunction bond are not as extensive as the statute requires, yet, if it contains a material part of the conditions required, the bond is not void but binds the obligors to the extent of such condition or conditions;[29] and the fact that it is so worded as to leave the obligors bound, notwithstanding they may pay all damages that plaintiff may sustain, does not avoid the bond.[30] It has been held that liability may be predicated on a bond, good as a common-law bond, although the requirements of the statute were not followed.[31]

The sufficiency of a bond given in connection with a restraining order or a preliminary injunction to support a subsequent preliminary injunction is considered infra subdivision g of this section.

Discretion of court. In the absence of a specific statutory provision relating thereto, the form and substance of the bond must necessarily be such as the well established principles of equity require;[32] and the determination and application of these principles are matters resting in the sound discretion of the court,[33] subject to the limitations that the court should prescribe the form applicable to the facts of the particular case.[34] Under a rule of practice to that effect, a federal court sitting as a court of equity has the right to mold its injunctive orders, including provision for a bond, to fit the facts before it.[35] If unreasonable terms are prescribed, the bond is not obligatory in equity to the extent that it is unreasonable as being without consideration;[36] but the fact that a bond required is more comprehensive than it need be does not render it illegal and void or without consideration.[37] It has been held that the court has no power to compel the giving of a bond to pay accrued damages.[38]

When the terms of the bond are prescribed by the court, the bond must comply with the court's order.[39]

(2) Amount

Except in so far as the amount of the bond is controlled by statute, the amount should be fixed by the court or judge in the exercise of his sound discretion.

Except in so far as a statutory provision is controlling as to the amount of the bond, see infra note 45, the amount to be named as penalty in the bond should be fixed by the court or judge,[40] in the exercise of his sound discretion,[41] which discretion, however, is a legal and not an arbitrary one.[42]

Review
Where no proof was offered to establish insufficiency of injunction bond, trial court will not be reversed

The amount fixed should be large enough to cover all costs and damages that may reasonably be expected to accrue, in case complainant is not entitled to the injunction,[43] so as to insure with all practicable certainty that he may sustain no ultimate loss, in case the injunction should be dissolved.[44]

Amount prescribed by statute. It has been held in at least one jurisdiction, under statute to that effect, that if the injunction is to restrain the execution of a money judgment or the collection of a debt the bond shall be fixed in double the amount of such judgment or debt.[45]

Bond too small. The fact that the amount fixed was too small does not constitute reversible error where the injunction was properly granted;[46] nor does it render the injunction void and authorize its disobedience with impunity.[47] The remedy is by timely application for its increase,[48] and the amount of the undertaking may be raised on a showing of good cause.[49]

Bond too large. The fact that the bond exceeds the statutory amount slightly will not destroy its validity and effect as a statutory bond.[50]

The order may be amended in case it fails to fix the amount of the bond.[51]

(3) To Whom Payable

Under statutes so providing, the bond must be made payable to the adverse party, and, it has been held, to interested parties; but substantial compliance with the requirement is sufficient.

Under statutes so providing, the bond must be made payable to the adverse party,[52] but a substantial compliance with this requirement will be sufficient.[53] Under statute to that effect it has been held that the bond must also be made payable to interested parties.[54] It has been held that the failure to name in the bond one of the parties enjoined is not a ground for objection,[55] since, as appears infra subdivision f of this section, such person nevertheless has full recourse against the bond.

Under some statutes an injunction bond, given to indemnify those against whom injunctive relief is sought, may be made payable either to the state or to the parties entitled to its benefit and protection.[56] Under a statute providing that no injunction shall operate until an undertaking is given to secure the damages incurred by the party enjoined, and that the county and prosecuting attorney shall prosecute or defend for the state or county in all civil suits or proceedings at law in which the state or county is a party, where an injunction was issued restraining the county and prosecuting attorney from pros-for failing to sustain motion to increase it.—Alabama Water Co. v. City of Jasper, 100 So. 486, 211 Ala. 280.

Attorney's fees

When a temporary writ is issued in an injunction suit, the law provides indemnity by way of an injunction bond to cover reasonable attorney's fees incurred in case the injunction is dissolved, and judges issuing such temporary writ of injunction should be careful to require an adequate bond.—City of Birmingham v. Wilkinson, 194 So. 548, 239 Ala. 199—32 C.J. p 315 note 66 [b].

Amount held sufficient

ecuting a party for violating the anti-gambling law the undertaking properly ran to the attorney individually, as neither the state nor county was a party.[57]

(4) Security or Sureties

The necessity and sufficiency of security or sureties depend on the requirements of the statutes.

Whether security[58] or sureties,[59] are necessary on bonds required by statute is to be determined by the particular statute.

Sufficiency of sureties. The amounts in which sureties must justify vary from the amount of the penalty in the bond[60] to double that amount;[61] but in no case can the sureties justify in a sum less than that named as a penalty in the bond.[62] In some jurisdictions the surety must be a householder or a freeholder;[63] in others it is not necessary that he should own real estate to qualify as a surety.[64]

Objection may be made by defendant to the sufficiency of the sureties,[65] on the ground of lack of financial responsibility or lack of legal capacity;[66] and the sureties may be required to justify on notice or request.[67]

(5) Execution, Signature, and Approval

Statutory and other requirements as to execution and approval of injunction bonds must be complied with.

The statutory and other requirements as to execution and acknowledgment of the bond must be complied with.[68]

Execution by complainant. In some jurisdictions the statutory requirement of giving bond is satisfied if the party obtaining the injunction gives or furnishes the bond, and he himself need not sign it.[69] In other jurisdictions, however, the statutes require the bond to be executed by complainant,[70] or by either the complainant or some one for him;[71] and, if the bond is not so signed, no liability for damages can be predicated thereon, either against complainant or his sureties.[72] However, it has been held that, if the bond is sufficient as to sureties and amount, the signing thereof by one of several plaintiffs will be sufficient.[73] Where plaintiff is required to execute the bond, it has been held in some jurisdictions that it may be signed for him by his attorney;[74] but in others it has been held that the signing of the bond by plaintiff's attorney in his behalf renders the bond a nullity.[75] The withdrawal from the case of the party furnishing the bond may render the bond ineffective;[76] but a declaration by other parties that the party furnishing the bond has withdrawn from the case will not render the bond ineffective where the record does not show such withdrawal.[77]

The names of the sureties need not appear in the body of the bond;[78] and it has been held that the bond may be signed by a surety in blank and afterward filled up.[79]

57. Wyo.—Littleton v. Burgess, 91 P. 832, 16 Wyo. 58, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 49.

58. Discretionary

Under statute requiring complainant seeking a temporary injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute to file a bond or undertaking in favor of the persons enjoined or restrained, it is within the discretion of the court whether or not to require security.—Isolantite, Inc., v. United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America, 22 A.2d 796, 130 N.J.Eq. 506, modified on other grounds Isolantite, Inc. v. United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, C. I. 59. In New York, under a rule of court it has been held that the officer granting an injunction may, under certain circumstances, dispense with sureties and allow complainant to give his own bond, where, in the opinion of such officer, the personal responsibility of complainant will afford ample protection to defendant. —Leavitt v. Place of execution. It has been held that the bond should be executed before the clerk of the court granting the injunction;[80] but under certain circumstances even that is unnecessary.[81]

Approval. Consent and acceptance of defendant are not requisite to the validity of the bond.[82] The approval of the bond by the proper court or officer is essential to give it validity.[83] However, it has been held that absence of a formal approval of a bond will not vitiate it if the bond was in form and substance the bond required by the court; and also that a refusal of the court to dissolve the injunction is a sufficient approval of the bond.[84] The court is not bound to approve of sureties whose solvency and sufficiency are unknown to the court.[85]

(6) Filing

An injunction bond should be filed with the clerk after being approved, the bond being a perfect obligation as soon as filed.

An injunction bond should be filed with the clerk after being approved;[86] and the bond is a perfect obligation as soon as filed.[87]

It has been held to be irregular for plaintiff to file an injunction bond unless its execution has been duly proved or acknowledged.[88] Filing the bond in the wrong case and with the wrong case number does not invalidate the bond where the style of the proper case is shown on its face.[89]

Time of filing. It has been held that the order should require the filing of a bond within a reasonable time and should specify the time so that the matter would not be left to the discretion of the applicant.[90] The bond need not be tendered along with the bill, because no bond can be tendered until the court has fixed the amount of the penalty;[91] but it has been held that a bond posted before the order requiring it was formally made is a sufficient compliance with the order where the language of such bond was prospective.[92]

f. To Whose Benefit Bond Inures

An injunction bond has been held to protect all defendants, whether served or not served, and, under statute, any person in interest.

An injunction bond, at least where the injunction is granted before service of process, is for the benefit of all defendants who are enjoined, whether served or not served; and if a defendant, without any service of the summons or injunction on him, obeys the injunction, he is entitled to damages on the dissolution of the injunction.[93] Under a statute providing that any person in interest may sue on any bond furnished in connection with any judicial proceeding, a party enjoined has full recourse to the bond even though he is not named therein.[94]

Intervener. It has been held that one who intervenes in the action after it has been instituted is not entitled to the benefit of the bond executed to the original defendant, since such intervention does not relate back to the beginning of the action.[95]

g. New or Additional Security

Additional security may be required where the security given appears to be inadequate. In general, a bond given for a restraining order cannot be continued for the subsequent injunction, and a new bond is required.

Additional security may be required on the insolvency of a surety,[96] or when for any other reason

Under a federal statute providing that where an interlocutory injunction is sought to restrain the enforcement of a statute on the ground of its unconstitutionality the application must be presented to a statutory three-judge court, where the issuance of the injunction has been authorized by the statutory court a district judge acting alone may approve the bond required for such injunction.—Monroe Gaslight & Fuel Co. v. Michigan Public Utilities Commission, D.C.Mich., 292 F. 139.

the security appears to be inadequate.[97] The court should not dissolve the injunction without first giving complainant reasonable time to procure additional sureties, or to present a sufficient bond.[98] Where plaintiff applies for leave to amend by substituting another name for defendant, bond in favor of the new defendant must be given before an injunction can issue.[99]

Sufficiency of former bond. While there is some authority to the contrary,[1] it is generally held that unless the terms and conditions of the bond so provide,[2] or the sureties expressly consent thereto,[3] a bond given for a restraining order cannot be continued so as to protect defendant where the restraining order is continued as an injunction pendente lite;[4] and where an injunction has issued subsequent to a temporary restraining order or to a former injunction that has been dissolved a new bond should be filed.[5]

h. Effect of Defects or Irregularities

Mere defects and irregularities of form may be cured by construction or amendment, or may even be overlooked; and unnecessary conditions will be regarded merely as surplusage.

The undertaking is to be considered in the light of the order requiring it;[6] and, while a bond which fails to comply with the statutory requirements is invalid,[7] so that one violating the injunction will not be held in contempt therefor,[8] mere defects and irregularities of form ordinarily are not fatal to the injunction, for they may be cured by construction or amendment, or even overlooked when unimportant.[9]

Unnecessary conditions; surplusage. The insertion in an injunction bond of conditions not required by law, but not against law, will not vitiate those that are required by law,[10] and the conditions not required will be regarded merely as surplusage.[11]

i. Effect of Failure to Give Bond

While there is some contrary authority, according to the weight of authority an injunction issued without the bond or undertaking required by statute as a condition precedent is void.

According to the weight of authority, where the statute requires that the party applying for an injunction shall, as a condition precedent to its issuance, execute a bond or undertaking, with sufficient sureties, an injunction issued without such bond or undertaking is inoperative and void;[12] the omission cannot be cured by a subsequent order of the court requiring a bond to be filed as of the date of the order of issuance of the injunction;[13] and, as appears in § 259 infra, the injunction may be disobeyed without danger of punishment for contempt.

On the other hand, many decisions hold that an injunction so awarded is irregular but not void;[14] that the subsequent execution of a proper bond will cure the irregularity and render the proceeding valid;[15] and that, if defendant waits an unreasonable time before making his objection, he will be presumed to have waived the irregularity.[16]

Some cases have held that the lack of a bond or undertaking is good ground for a motion to dissolve the injunction, but that the proper order in such case is that a bond be executed within a reasonable time or the injunction be dissolved in default thereof;[17] and, according to some decisions, if complainant offers to supply the omission this may be allowed even in the court of last resort.[18]

j. Estoppel and Waiver of Defects

The party awarded an injunction is estopped to deny the validity of the bond. The party enjoined may also lose the right to object by estoppel or waiver.

Persons who are awarded an injunction on giving bond are estopped to deny that the bond was proper in form or substance.[19] On the other hand, persons in whose favor the bond is given cannot at the same time question its sufficiency and attempt to hold the obligors thereon;[20] and they waive objections for defects in the bond by failure to make timely objections thereto,[21] or by entering into an express agreement that it should be considered sufficient.[22] It has been held that where the party enjoined fails to obey the injunction, such party ordinarily will not be permitted to object to the form and sufficiency of the bond.[23]

Only matters germane to the cause of action pleaded may constitute a defense to a suit for injunction.

§ 168. Jurisdiction

a. In general
b. As affected by parties; territorial limits
c. As depending on amount in controversy
d. As affected by agreement of parties
e. Allowance in vacation or at chambers
f. Particular courts
g. Federal three-judge court

a. In General

An injunction issued by a court without jurisdiction is void.

Jurisdiction of a court sufficient to justify the issuance of an injunction involves both jurisdiction over the cause as well as over the parties.[26] In this and the following sections the discussion of "jurisdiction" is confined to a discussion of the power to hear and determine the application for an injunction, and the inquiry is directed to the ascertainment of the court, judicial officer, or tribunal, before whom the proceedings may be instituted. "Jurisdiction" as it rests on the facts which may appear as presenting a particular case for the proper exercise of the power of a court of equity is considered supra §§ 12–161 in the discussion of the grounds and subjects of injunction.

The fact that the court is without jurisdiction to grant some of the relief sought in the petition does not deprive it of its jurisdiction to determine a prayer for an injunction,[27] nor does the existence of facts constituting a good defense on the merits to an application for a writ of injunction oust the court of the power to hear and decide the case.[28]

An injunction granted by the court without jurisdiction is void.[29]

b. As Affected by Parties; Territorial Limits

Jurisdiction of the necessary parties is essential to the power of a court to issue an injunction; but, where such parties are within, or subject to, its jurisdiction, its injunction may operate outside its territorial limits.

Generally the right of a court to issue injunctions is only coextensive with the limits of its territorial jurisdiction.[30] It is also a general rule that an injunction operates in personam,[31] and not against the

24. Prior suit for injunction
Fact that defendants were named in an earlier suit for an injunction to restrain the violation of an order of an administrative agency, which suit is still pending, is not a defense in a later suit, where the acts complained of in the latter suit are not those involved in the earlier one, and the order sought to be enforced has been materially altered since the first suit was instituted.—U. Wash.—State v. Kennan, 76 P. 516, 35 Wash. 52.

Preliminary injunction
As a general rule, no preliminary injunction can be awarded against persons who are not parties to the suit.—Marty v. Marty, 73 N.Y.S. 369, 66 App.Div. 527—32 C.J. p 375 note 57.

Submission to jurisdiction
(1) Jurisdiction of the person may exist from the fact that defendants have submitted to its jurisdiction in a pending suit with relation to the same subject matter.—Marco v. Low, 55 Me. 549—32 C.J. p 287 note 79.
(2) A plaintiff in a law action, who abandoned his appeal from determination of court of chancery in refusing to strike defendant's bill to restrain prosecution of the law action, and filed an answer and counterclaim alleging that plaintiff was a partner engaged in joint adventure with defendant, was held to have submitted himself to jurisdiction of chancery.—De Geeter v. Bennett, 32 A. 2d 335, 133 N.J.Eq. 349.

Jurisdiction of res
(1) In some cases jurisdiction of the res has been held to confer jurisdiction of the parties.—Mossy v. Gordy, 28 La.Ann. 585—32 C.J. p 287 note 74.
(2) Where the res was within the jurisdiction and the order could be made effective, one not personally within the jurisdiction of the court was held to be properly enjoined.—Moors v. Ladenburg, 59 N.E. 676, 178 Mass. 272.

(2) Injunction cannot be issued against nonresident on whom no service can be had except by some form of constructive service.—Gainsburg v. Dodge, 101 S.W.2d 178, 193 Ark. 473.
(3) Jurisdiction over nonresident defendant could not be obtained in suit for injunction by joinder of superintendent of banks as party defendant, over whom court had no jurisdiction.—Askew v. Bassett Furniture Co., 158 S.E. 577, 172 Ga. 700.

Mandatory injunction
Court of equity will ordinarily not grant an injunction compelling action by a nonresident in a foreign state or country.—Niagara Falls International Bridge Co. v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 148 N.E. 797, 241 N.Y. 85, modifying 209 N.Y. S. 79, 212 App.Div. 705.

County limits
Where process of the county court cannot be served outside the county in a personam proceeding, such a court is without jurisdiction in an injunction proceeding against one outside the county.—Lunine v. Pennsylvania Alcohol Permit Board, 157 A. 470, 305 Pa. 162.

Potential jurisdiction
Where court of chancery acquired potential jurisdiction to grant preliminary temporary injunction, but actual jurisdiction was not subsequently acquired, failure relates back to inception of cause in so far as affecting jurisdiction to adjudicate right to permanent injunction on merits.—Iron City Sav. Bank v. Isaacsen, 164 S.E. 520, 158 Va. 609.

On the other hand, and in accordance with the general rule, stated in Equity § 81, that a court of equity having jurisdiction of the person of defendant may render any appropriate decree acting directly on the person, even though the subject matter affected is outside the jurisdiction, a court having jurisdiction of the parties may grant and enforce an injunction, although the subject matter affected is beyond its territorial jurisdiction, or requires defendant to do or refrain from doing anything beyond its territorial jurisdiction which it could require him to do or refrain from doing within the jurisdiction.[37] Of course, where neither defendants nor the subject matter are within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, an injunction cannot issue.[38]

Injunction against receiver. An injunction against the acts of a receiver should be sought in the court appointing him.[39]

c. As Depending on Amount in Controversy

A power to issue an injunction is not limited by general requirements as to the amount in controversy unless the statutory intent is clearly apparent.

A general power conferred on a court to issue injunctions is not subject to a limitation as to the amount in controversy applicable to other powers of the court unless the intent to provide such a limitation is clearly apparent.[40]

d. As Affected by Agreement of Parties

Jurisdiction not otherwise existing to issue an injunction cannot be conferred by consent of the parties.

In accordance with general rules, it is held that jurisdiction to grant an injunction cannot be conferred by a stipulation of parties where the facts are not such as to give the court jurisdiction.[41] However, where there is otherwise jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, the parties in a proper case may agree on the terms of restraint,[42] and, where the subject matter of a proceeding for an injunction is within the court's jurisdiction, a bill is not subject to a general demurrer for want of equity be-

(1) Statute empowering circuit judge to issue injunctions at any place in the circuit to be effective in any place therein, does not limit the power of the judge to issue an injunction against one within the court's jurisdiction, although involving action beyond the circuit.—Sun Cab Co. v. Cloud, 159 A. 922, 162 Md. 419.

(2) Under a statutory provision that equity causes are to be tried in the county of the residence of defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed, an action for an injunction against waste may be tried in the county of the residence of defendant, although the land is situated in another county and another statute provides that cases respecting titles to land must be tried where the land lies.—Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 357, 48 Am.R. 572.

(3) A judge may be authorized by statute to award injunctions with respect to judgments rendered or proceedings apprehended out of his own circuit, with a limitation excluding the right of such judge to hear and determine the cause.—Randolph v. Tucker, 10 Leigh 655, 37 Va. 655.

cause the suit is filed by the parties' agreement.[43]

e. Allowance in Vacation or at Chambers

Statutory or constitutional authority must exist before a judge may issue an injunction, temporary or permanent, in vacation or at chambers. Such authority is frequently conferred.

In the absence of statutory or constitutional authority, a judge at chambers[44] or in vacation[45] cannot issue an injunction. However, by statute, jurisdiction to issue injunctions at chambers, as well as in court,[46] and in vacation as well as in term,[47] is generally conferred. The power to grant injunctions in term time or vacation carries with it the power to refuse such writs in term time or vacation.[48]

It has been held that a requirement that equity cases shall be heard in the county where defendant resides does not require that an application for a temporary injunction made ex parte to the judge at chambers must be made in such county.[49]

Passing on the merits. The sole question before the judge is to determine whether in the exercise of discretion he will grant or refuse the application,[50] and hence, except in so far as necessary to examine into the merits for a proper exercise of his discretion,[51] a judge in vacation or at chambers may not on application for a temporary injunction try the case on the merits and make a final order,[52] or pass on exceptions to the petition,[53] which can be acted on only by the court,[54] and it has been held improper to grant a temporary injunction at chambers on disputed material facts.[55]

Mandatory injunction will not ordinarily be granted at chambers,[56] and the same is true as to a mandatory injunction in vacation.[57]

The rule that a preliminary mandatory injunction will not issue for the purpose of compelling the transfer of property from one litigant to another, as considered supra § 52, applies with full force and effect where the hearing is before a judge at chambers.[58]

In case in another court. A judge of one court has no power to grant in vacation or at chambers an injunction in a cause pending in another court,[59] unless he is expressly vested with such power by constitution or statute.[60]

When a judge is vested by statute or constitution merely with the power to issue an injunction in an action pending in another court, such judge may grant an injunction in an action pending outside his own judicial district only when the office of judge of that district is absent or unable to act.[61]

f. Particular Courts

The jurisdiction of particular courts in injunction cases is generally defined by the constitutional or statutory provisions creating them, the power to issue injunctions being usually confined to courts having general equity jurisdiction.

Since the jurisdiction of particular courts is, as a general rule, expressly defined by the constitutions or statutes creating them, see Courts § 15, their jurisdiction of matters relating to injunctions as a rule must be determined by the existence and construction of such constitutions or statutes.[62] Injunctions, however, being matters of purely equitable cognizance,[63] are, in the absence of express statutory provision,[64] within the jurisdiction only of courts possessing general equitable powers.[65] The power does not generally exist in courts of limited jurisdiction,[66] as, for example, courts limited to probate jurisdiction.[67] Where a court is not clothed with chancery jurisdiction and there is no statute authorizing it to grant injunctions, a statute authorizing the judge thereof to allow injunctions does not bestow like power on the court,[68] nor does a grant of special chancery powers, not including the power to issue injunctions, confer the power to grant an injunction.[69] On the other hand, if a court has general chancery jurisdiction, the mere fact that it has common-law jurisdiction as well in no way changes or obliterates its equitable jurisdiction in the absence of express legislative restriction.[70]

It has been held that where a court has power to issue a temporary injunction, it has also the power to make such an injunction permanent.[71]

Appellate court and judges thereof. Except where such jurisdiction has been conferred by constitutional provisions, appellate courts have no original jurisdiction to issue writs of injunction.[72] In some jurisdictions, the power must be conferred by organic and not by statutory provisions,[73] and when so conferred, the power cannot be limited, abridged, and enlarged or interfered with in any manner by legislation.[74]

When power to issue injunctions has been conferred on an appellate court, such jurisdiction cannot be exercised with regard to actions still pending and undetermined in other courts,[75] or in cases not of equity jurisdiction,[76] nor will it be exercised where the extreme shortness of time is likely to render a suit for injunction ineffective.[77]

Individual judges of appellate courts have no jurisdiction to issue writs of injunction in the absence of express authority therefor.[78] Nevertheless, this power may be conferred on them,[79] but it can be exercised only under the conditions prescribed by the statutes conferring the power.[80] Authority so given to a judge of an appellate court cannot be exercised by the court collectively.[81]

Federal courts. The power of federal courts generally to issue injunctions is considered in Federal Courts §§ 14, 286, 311. The special three-judge district court provided for by several acts of congress in injunction cases of a specified nature is considered infra subdivision g of this section.

g. Federal Three-Judge Court

(1) In general
(2) When required
(3) Nature; extent of power

(1) In General

Under the provisions of some federal statutes no interlocutory or permanent injunction may be issued in specified instances by a district court or judge, unless the application therefor is heard and determined by three judges convened in the manner provided.

As considered in Federal Courts § 14, the federal courts have power to issue writs of injunction within the equity jurisdiction of the court. In appropriate cases this power may be exercised by the supreme court, as considered in Federal Courts § 196 a, the circuit court of appeals, as considered in Federal Courts § 286, and district courts, as considered in Federal Courts § 311. However, a limitation on this power to issue injunctions is imposed by several acts of congress which prohibit the issuance of an interlocutory or permanent injunction by a district judge or court in certain cases unless a three-judge court is convened, in the manner provided, to hear and determine the application therefor.[82] Apart from, and in the absence of, such

Under Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C.A. § 217, and Urgent Deficiencies Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 47, an application for an interlocutory injunction in a proceeding to annul the orders of the secretary of agriculture is within the jurisdiction of a three-judge court, which must be convened to hear such application.—Tagg Bros. & Moorhead v. U. S., Neb., 50 S.Ct. 220, 280 U.S. 420, 74 L.Ed. 524, affirming, D.C., 29 F.2d 750.

Federal Alcohol Administration Act

Where complaint attempted to restrain enforcement of Federal Alcohol Administration Act as well as regulations thereunder on the ground that they were repugnant to the Constitution, the case was properly heard by a three-judge court.—William Jameson & Co. v. Morgenthau, D.C.D.C., 25 F.Supp. 771, vacated on other grounds 59 S.Ct. 804, 307 U.S. 171, 83 L.Ed. 1189.

Validity of federal tax

(1) A suit in statutory three-judge court to enjoin collector of internal revenue from collecting tax on gross sales of bituminous coal production, under a federal statute, is appropriate to test validity of the tax.—Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, D.C.Ark., 31 F.Supp. 125.

(2) In such a suit, such court had no jurisdiction to try de novo the fact question of such company's status under the Bituminous Coal Act or the character of the coal produced by it, or to reconsider evidence taken in prior proceedings.—Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, supra.

The requirement for, and jurisdiction of, a three-judge court in an action to enjoin enforcement of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is discussed in Commerce § 148 d (3).

(2) When Required

The three-judge court is required, and takes jurisdiction only, in cases coming strictly within the provisions of the particular statute governing.

Under Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, a three-judge court must be convened, and may take jurisdiction, in a case where an application is made for an interlocutory injunction to restrain enforcement of a state statute, or order of an administrative board or commission acting under such a statute, on the ground of its unconstitutionality.[84] Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 380 a, such a court must be

83. Reason for rule

The federal courts are constitutionally or by statute courts of limited jurisdiction as to subject matter, and their composition is prescribed by statute.—Hudson & Manhattan R. Co. v. Hardy, D.C.N.Y., 22 F.Supp. 105, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 103 F.2d 327.

Purpose of statute

(1) "The legislation was enacted for the manifest purpose of taking away the power of a single United States judge, whether District Judge, Circuit Judge, or Circuit Justice holding a District Court of the United States, to issue an interlocutory injunction against the execution of a state statute by a state officer or of an order of an administrative board of the state pursuant to a state statute, on the ground of the federal unconstitutionality of the statute. . . . The wording of the section leaves no doubt that Congress was by provisions ex industria seeking to make interference by interlocutory injunction from a federal court with the enforcement of state legislation regularly enacted and in course of execution, a matter of the adequate hearing and the full deliberation which the presence of three judges, one of whom should be a Circuit Justice or Judge, was likely to secure. It was to prevent the improvident granting of such injunctions by a single judge, and the possible unnecessary conflict between federal and state authority always to be deprecated."—Cumberland Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Louisiana Public Service Commission, La., 43 S.Ct. 75, 76, 260 U.S. 212, 67 L.Ed. 217.

Supp. 926, denying new trial 38 F. Supp. 896.

Elements

(1) Four things are necessary to bring a case within the statute, namely: First, that an interlocutory injunction is sought; second, that such injunction will result in suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of a statute of a state, or the order of an administrative board or commission acting under or pursuant to statute; third, that the ground on which the interlocutory injunction is asked is the unconstitutionality of the statute or order; and fourth, that it is sought to restrain by the interlocutory injunction the action of an officer of the state.—Cannonball Transp. Co. v. American Stages, D.C.Ohio, 53 F.2d 1050, 1051—In re Henrietta Mills Co. v. Rutherford County, D.C. N.C., 26 F.2d 799—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works of West Virginia, D.C.W.Va., 3 F.Supp. 791.

(2) "Each of [the] . . . conditions must exist before the single District Judge is shorn of his jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause without calling to his assistance two other federal judges as specified."—Cannonball Transp. Co. v. American Stages, supra.

Form of decree

Where decree dismissing bill, signed by one judge, was sanctioned by opinion signed by two judges and concurring opinion of third, it was equivalent to announcement in open court, three judges sitting.—Dohany v. Rogers, Mich., 50 S.Ct. 299, 281 U.S. 362, 74 L.Ed. 904, 68 A.L.R. 434, affirming, D.C., 33 F.2d 918.

Jurisdictional requirement

Requirement of a three-judge court is not a mere privilege or right which the parties may waive but is a jurisdictional requirement.—Riss & Co. v. Hoch, C.C.A.Kan., 99 F.2d 553.

Power of single judge

(1) A single judge on application for interlocutory injunction to restrain enforcement of a state law had no jurisdiction to dismiss the bill.—Riss & Co. v. Hoch, supra.

(2) However, a district court composed of three judges granting a temporary injunction against the enforcement of a state statute, after a hearing, may authorize the district judge to issue a similar injunction to any other intervener or plaintiff whose case is not essentially distinguishable from that of plaintiff convened, and may take jurisdiction, where a temporary or permanent injunction is sought to restrain enforcement of a federal statute on the ground of its unconstitutionality.[85]

It is only in cases coming strictly within the provisions of the particular statute that a three-judge court must be convened,[86] it being necessary that the judge to whom the application for an injuncin the suit in which the injunction was granted without a further hearing before the three judges.—J. & A. Freiberg Co. v. Dawson, D.C.Ky., 274 F. 420, affirmed Dawson v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 41 S.Ct. 272, 255 U.S. 288, 65 L.Ed. 638.

Restraining suspension of license

Where bankrupt sought to enjoin his judgment creditor and the commissioner of motor vehicles of New York from suspending his license to drive and his certificate of registration for failure to satisfy judgment in automobile accident case on ground of unconstitutionality of statute authorizing them to do so, a statutory three-judge court was required to be convened to hear the case against the commissioner.—Reitz v. Mealey, D.C.N.Y., 34 F.Supp. 532—Healey v. Murnaghan, D.C.N.Y., 34 F.Supp. 203.

Purpose of statute

The purpose of the statute was to require three judges to determine the issuance of injunctions suspending the enforcement of an act of congress on the ground that such act is unconstitutional.—Washington Water Power Co. v. City of Coeur D'Alene, D.C.Idaho, 24 F.Supp. 790.

Statute not retroactive

The statute relates to the issuance or granting of such injunctions in the first instance, and not to a permanent injunction already issued by a final decree.—Washington Water Power Co. v. City of Coeur D'Alene, supra.

Distinguished from cases under 28 U.S.C.A. § 380

Apart from the fact that one deals with an attack on a state statute and the other with an attack on a federal statute, § 380a is distinguishable from § 380 in that it is inapplicable to attacks on administrative regulations and orders.—William Jameson & Co. v. Morgenthau, D.C., 59 S.Ct. 804, 307 U.S. 171, 83 L.Ed. 1189, vacating, D.C., 25 F.Supp. 771.

Imes, D.C.Ohio, 11 F.2d 191—Hume v. Mahan, D.C.Ky., 1 F.Supp. 142, reversed on other grounds Mahan v. Hume, 53 S.Ct. 223, 287 U.S. 575, 77 L.Ed. 505.

As extraordinary procedure

(1) The three-judge procedure is an extraordinary one, imposing a heavy burden on federal courts, with attendant expense and delay. That procedure, designed for a specific class of cases, sharply defined, should not be lightly extended.—International Ladies' Garment Workers Union v. Donnelly Garment Co., Mo., 58 S.Ct. 875, 304 U.S. 243, 82 L.Ed. 1316, vacating, D.C., Donnelly Garment Co. v. International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 21 F. Supp. 807, mandate conformed to 23 F.Supp. 998, reversed 99 F.2d 309, certiorari denied International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union v. Donnelly Garment Co., 59 S.Ct. 364, 305 U.S. 662, 83 L.Ed. 430—California Water Service Co. v. City of Redding, Cal., 58 S.Ct. 865, 304 U.S. 252, 82 L.Ed. 1323, affirming, D.C., 22 F. Supp. 641—Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. v. Oklahoma Packing Co., Okl., 54 S.Ct. 732, 734, 292 U.S. 386, 78 L. Ed. 1318—Ex parte Collins, Ariz., 48 S.Ct. 585, 277 U.S. 565, 72 L.Ed. 990.

(2) "The extraordinary procedure before a court of three judges required by statute in suit to restrain enforcement of state statute by state officers cannot properly be extended to cases in which there is no substantial basis for relief by injunction restraining the action by state officers in enforcement or carrying into effect a challenged state statute of general application."—Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., N.J., 59 S.Ct. 709, 714, 306 U.S. 573, 83 L. Ed. 994, dismissing appeal, D.C., Sovereign Camp, W. O. W. v. Wilentz, 23 F.Supp. 23.

Strict application of statute

The statute is not a measure of broad social policy to be construed with great liberality, but is an enactment technical in the strict sense of the term and to be applied as such.—Phillips v. U. S., Okl., 61 S. Ct. 480, 312 U.S. 246, 85 L.Ed. 809, vacating, D.C., U. S. v. Phillips, 38 F.Supp. 261.

Assessment of damages

Where three-judge federal district court issued temporary injunction restraining state officials from enforcing state law but dissolved injunction on final hearing, motion of state officials for assessment of damages and costs against the plaintiffs and their injunction bond sureties presented questions for consideration of district court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction and the two judges called in to assist district judge in passing on the application for injunction should not have participated in consideration of the motion to assess damages since the three-judge statutory requirement was inapplicable.—Public Service Commission of Missouri v. Brashear Freight Lines, Mo., 61 S.Ct. 784, 312 U.S. 621, 85 L.Ed. 1083, reversing, C.C.A., 114 F.2d 1, certiorari granted 61 S.Ct. 392, 311 U.S. 642, 85 L.Ed. 410, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 938, 313 U.S. 598, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

U.S.—Henrietta Mills Co. v. Rutherford County, D.C.N.C., 26 F.2d 799.

Injunction unnecessary

Where bankrupt sought to enjoin judgment creditor and commissioner of motor vehicles of New York from suspending his license to drive and his certificate of registration for failure to satisfy judgment in automobile accident case on ground of unconstitutionality of statute authorizing them to do so, but the commissioner could not act to suspend the license unless creditor requested clerk of court where judgment was rendered to forward a copy of judgment to commissioner, three-judge court, convened because a state official was involved, would not pass on motion against commissioner, but it was for the judge of the bankruptcy court first to dispose of motion against creditor.—Healey v. Murnaghan, D.C.N.Y., 34 F.Supp. 203.

Puerto Rico

(1) Puerto Rico district court is not "a district court of the United States" within the statute requiring convening of three-judge court where constitutionality of federal statute is attacked in any "district court of the United States."—Porto Rico Ry., Light & Power Co. v. Colom, C.C.A. Puerto Rico, 106 F.2d 345, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 263, 308 U.S. 617, 84 L.Ed. 516.

tion is presented determine from the bill whether there are present the elements which call for the convening of a three-judge court.[87] A three-judge court need not be convened to hear and determine the application, if the judge to whom it is made determines that the basic elements of a federal court's jurisdiction are absent,[88] or that there is no basis for granting the injunction.[89] If such judge finds that the elements essential to the jurisdiction of a federal district court are absent, he may dismiss the complaint,[90] although on determining that the requisite jurisdiction is present in a case calling for a three-judge court, he may not dismiss the complaint on the merits.[91]

Request for injunction. An application to restrain enforcement of the allegedly unconstitutional statute is an essential factor and must be present to call for convening of a three-judge court.[92] That the constitutionality of a statute is in issue does not of itself bring the case within the requirement.[93]

(2) Puerto Rico is not a state, within a statute inhibiting the granting, until hearing by three judges, of interlocutory injunction restraining action of officers under statute of states, on ground of unconstitutionality of statute.—Benedicto v. West India & Panama Telegraph Co., Puerto Rico, 256 F. 417, 167 C.C.A. 545. Mandamus by supreme court to compel assembly of court see Federal Courts § 199.

"District judge is authorized to determine, before going to the expense and trouble of assembling such court, whether the relief sought could be granted."—Pullen v. Patton, D.C.Tex., 19 F.Supp. 340, 342.

Determination of jurisdiction

Presence of three judges to pass on initial question of jurisdiction in the district court is unnecessary where such court is asked to grant interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining enforcement of state statute on ground of its unconstitutionality.—Ex parte Poresky, 54 S. Ct. 3, 290 U.S. 30, 78 L.Ed. 152.

Substantial claim

Where petition to convene three-judge court does not present sufficient facts showing that there is real substance to the claim, district judge may dismiss for want of jurisdiction.—Farr v. O'Keefe, D.C.Miss., 27 F.Supp. 216.

89. U.S.—Independent Gin & Warehouse Co. v. Dunwoody, D.C.Ala., 30 F.2d 306, affirmed, C.C.A., 40 F. 2d 1—Pullen v. Patton, D.C.Tex., 19 F.Supp. 340.

Basis for injunctive relief must be found to exist before judge to whom application for three-judge court is made may convene such court.—Independent Gin & Warehouse Co. v. Dunwoody, D.C.Ala., 30 F.2d 306, affirmed, C.C.A., 40 F.2d 1—Farr v. O'Keefe, D.C.Miss., 27 F.Supp. 216.

Single district judge should not deny complainant opportunity to be heard by three judges on the question that is fairly open to debate, but may dismiss for want of jurisdiction where question of unconstitutionality of state statute presented as ground for interlocutory injunction lacks necessary substance and no other ground of jurisdiction appears.—Ex parte Porasky, Mass., 54 S.Ct. 3, 290 U.S. 30, 78 L.Ed. 152—Pullen v. Patton, D.C.Tex., 19 F. Supp. 340.

Indispensable party missing

Although single judge should not dismiss complaint on merits where interlocutory injunction is sought on constitutional grounds, he should scrutinize the complaint carefully to ascertain whether a substantial claim of unconstitutionality has been presented, and hence should have granted motion by secretary of interior to dismiss injunction action by Indian tribe on ground that United States was an indispensable party.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 178.

C.A.Mich., 49 F.2d 759, dismissing appeal, D.C., Fisher v. Brucker, 41 F.2d 774.

Extent of power

"If an application for an interlocutory judgment is made and pressed to restrain the enforcement of a state statute, or of an administrative order made pursuant to a state statute, upon the ground that such enforcement would be in violation of the Federal Constitution, a single judge has no jurisdiction to entertain a motion to dismiss the bill on the merits. . . . His authority is strictly limited to granting . . . a temporary restraining order . . . pending the determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction. Upon making such an order, it is his duty . . . to call two other judges, as the statute directs, to assist him in hearing and determining that application."—Stratton v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co., Ill., 51 S.Ct. 8, 10, 282 U.S. 10, 75 L.Ed. 135, reversing, C.C.A., St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Emmerson, 30 F.2d 322, which reversed, D.C., 27 F.2d 1005.

92. "The entire procedure prescribed . . . turns on the presentation of an application for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of a federal statute. It is when such application is presented to a judge that the participation by two other judges is required."—International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union v. Donnelly Garment Co., 59 S.Ct. 364, 305 U.S. 662, 83 L.Ed. 430.

93. U.S.—International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union v. Donnelly Garment Co., supra.

In the case of an act of congress the application must under 28 U.S.C.A. § 380 a be for either a temporary or permanent injunction. In the case of an attack on a state statute or administrative order, the three-judge court must be convened only where an application for a preliminary or interlocutory injunction is made and pressed to a hearing,[94] an application for a permanent injunction being insufficient to bring the case within the requirements of the statute.[95]

The court cannot be convened to hear incidental motions in the course of an action,[96] nor can it be convened in a habeas corpus proceeding.[97]

Claim of unconstitutionality. The procedure which calls for the intervention of a three-judge court where the constitutionality of a federal or state statute, or state administrative order, is involved being extraordinary,[98] a substantial claim or question of unconstitutionality must be present to justify convening such a court to consider the application for an injunction against enforcement of such a statute or administrative order.[99] Con-

After denial of application

Where three-judge district court denied interlocutory injunction sought by utility to enjoin enforcement of order of public service commission of Indiana fixing temporary schedule of water rates, and utility, after commission's adoption of permanent schedule, filed amended bill assailing permanent rates as confiscatory under Fourteenth Amendment, but not seeking an interlocutory injunction, case was properly heard in district court by a single judge.—McCart v. Indianapolis Water Co., 58 S.Ct. 324, 302 U.S. 419, 82 L.Ed. 336, modifying, C.C.A., Indianapolis Water Co. v. McCart, 89 F.2d 522, reversing, D.C., 13 F.Supp. 110, certiorari granted McCart v. Constitutionality as sole question

Where sole question for determination in a criminal case is the constitutionality of a state statute, a single district court judge has jurisdiction of case.—U. S. ex rel. Murphy v. Warden of Clinton Prison, D.C.N. Y., 29 F.Supp. 486.

After denial of preliminary injunction

Where, after denial of petition for interlocutory injunction, plaintiff filed in same suit amended and supplemental bill seeking permanent injunction, continuance of three-judge court, which heard application for interlocutory injunction, was not required.—Indianapolis Water Co. v. McCart, D.C.Ind., 13 F.Supp. 107.

Motion to dismiss

The requirement of the three judges is inapplicable on motion to dismiss the complaint, which is equivalent to a demurrer to the whole bill, since, if the motion be refused, and no answer be interposed, the decree would be final, and a final injunction would issue.—Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Railroad Commission of South Carolina, D.C. S.C., 280 F. 901.

How determined

(1) Allegations of bill alone determine the existence of a substantial question as to the constitutionality of a state statute, which would vening such a court is unnecessary when only the construction[1] or application[2] of a statute is involved.

State statute or administrative order. In the case of a statute or administrative order under Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, by the unconstitutionality of a statute is meant that the statute is in conflict with the federal Constitution[3] or federal statute,[4] but not that it is invalid under the state constitution.[5] In determining the application of the requirement for a three-judge court, regard must be had to the nature of the statute enforcement of which is to be restrained.[6] Under Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, the court must be convened, and can take jurisdiction, only when the constitutionality of a state statute[7] is involved, and the state justify a three-judge federal court in taking jurisdiction.—Liberty Nat. Life Ins. Co. v. Read, D.C.Okl., 24 F.Supp. 103—Chapman v. Boynton, D.C.Kan., 4 F.Supp. 43.

(2) Lack of a substantial question of constitutional law may appear either because it is obvious from reading of the statute, or because it so clearly results from previous decisions of supreme court as to foreclose the subject.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F. Supp. 179.

Diversity of citizenship is insufficient to confer jurisdiction on three-judge court in the absence of a substantial claim of unconstitutionality. —Wylie v. State Board of Equalization of California, D.C.Cal., 21 F. Supp. 604.

Statutes formerly upheld

(1) A substantial claim of unconstitutionality is not presented with regard to a statute of a type which has uniformly been upheld by earlier decisions.—Rok v. Legg, D.C.Okl., 27 F.Supp. 243.

(2) Where statute is of long standing and has been often before courts, which have repeatedly rejected claims of its unconstitutionality, there is no occasion for invoking extraordinary remedy of three-judge court to determine constitutionality thereof.—Acret v. Harwood, D.C.Cal., 41 F.Supp. 492.

Abandonment of constitutional question

A suit to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the National Mediation Board is not one requiring a three-judge court as seeking to enjoin the enforcement of an act of Congress on constitutional grounds, where, although raised in the pleadings, the constitutional question has been abandoned and is not pressed. —Hudson & M. R. Co. v. Hardy, D. C.N.Y., 22 F.Supp. 105, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 103 F.2d 327, certiorari denied Hudson & M. R. Co. v. Cahill, 59 S.Ct. 1038, 307 U. S. 640, 83 L.Ed. 1521.

Federal statute

Under Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S. C.A. § 380, a three-judge court is not necessary for determination of question of construction of federal statute.—Query v. U. S., S.C., 62 S.Ct. 1122, 316 U.S. 486, 86 L.Ed. 1616, vacating, C.C.A., 121 F.2d 631, affirming, D.C., U. S. v. Query, 37 F. Supp. 972, certiorari denied 62 S. Applicability of statute immaterial

Where action for injunction was brought on the theory that statute was constitutional, but consent decree settled all issues except one as to whether the act was applicable, the statute requiring three-judge federal district court was no longer applicable.—Green v. Phillips Petroleum Co., C.C.A.Iowa, 119 F.2d 466 reversing, D.C., Standard Oil Co. v. Green, 34 F.Supp. 30.

State statute conflicting with federal statute

A suit by manufacturer of processed or renovated butter, to restrain officers of Alabama department of agriculture from seizing country or packing stock butter moving in interstate commerce into manufacturer's Alabama plant for renovating and processing, was for district judge as a single judge and was not for a three-judge court, where manufacturer did not attack constitutionality of Alabama statutes relating to renovated butter, but merely asserted that Congress had preempted field of manufacture of processed or renovated butter in interstate commerce to exclusion of Ala-statute in question must be of general application[8] or in the case of an attack on an order of an administrative board or commission acting under such a statute.[9] It is unnecessary in the case of a statute affecting only a particular municipality or district;[10] nor is it necessary in the case of a municibama.—Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, C.C.A.Ala., 116 F.2d 227, certiorari granted 61 S.Ct. 834, 313 U.S. 551, 85 L.Ed. 1515, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 491, 315 U.S. 148, 86 L.Ed. 754.

Direct relationship to statute

Even where a state statute is attacked as unconstitutional, the federal statute, requiring a three-judge court in an action to enjoin a state officer from enforcing a state statute on ground of its unconstitutionality is inapplicable unless the action complained of is directly attributable to the state statute.—Ex parte Bransford, Ariz., 60 S.Ct. 947, 310 U.S. 354, 84 L.Ed. 1249.

Order for martial law

(1) If the action of state officials in declaring martial law and using the state militia is challenged and involves the constitutionality of a state statute or constitution deemed to authorize such action, a three-judge court should take jurisdiction.—Sterling v. Constantin, Tex., 53 S.Ct. 190, 287 U.S. 378, 77 L.Ed. 375.

(2) If, however, the acts of declaring martial law and calling out the militia are attacked as unlawful without attacking the statute under whose authority the state officials acted, the case is not one calling for a three-judge court.—Phillips v. U.S., Okl., 61 S.Ct. 480, 312 U.S. 246, 85 L.Ed. 800, vacating, D.C., U.S. v. Phillips, 33 F.Supp. 261.

Tax assessment

A tax assessment is not an "order" or "statute" within the requirement.—Gully v. Interstate Natural Gas Co., Miss., 54 S.Ct. 565, 292 U.S. 19, 78 L.Ed. 1088, reversing, D.C., Interstate Natural Gas Co. v. Tax under unconstitutional statute Suit to restrain state tax commissioner from paying into state treasury taxes paid under protest under statute claimed to violate federal constitution was held properly brought before three-judge court.—Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. Fox, D.C.W.Va., 6 F.Supp. 494, reversed on other grounds Fox v. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, 55 S.Ct. 333, 294 U.S. 87, 79 L.Ed. 78, and rehearing denied 56 S.Ct. 511, 294 U.S. 732, 79 L.Ed. 1261.

Individual as "board" or "commission"

Individual, such as prohibition commissioner of West Virginia, may constitute "state administrative board or commission" within statute requiring three-judge court.—McCormick & Co. v. Brown, C.C.A.W.Va., 52 F.2d 934.

Consent of commission

Where New Jersey statute permitted a compromise of delinquent taxes by municipality and coterminous school district in which municipal finance commission composed of state officers was functioning but made commission's written consent a prerequisite to execution of the compromise which the commission could not command, commission's written consent was not an "order," within meaning of statute requiring suit for interlocutory injunction restraining enforcement of order of a state commission to be heard by court of three judges.—Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., N.J., 59 S.Ct. 709, 306 U.S. 573, 83 L.Ed. 994, dismissing appeal, D.C., Sovereign Camp, W. O. W. v. Wilentz, 23 F.Supp. 23.

Notice to attend hearing

Issuance of notices by state industrial board sua sponte to attend hearing to determine board's jurisdiction under state compensation law was held "order" within the statute.—Albee Godfrey Whale Creek Co. v. Perkins, D.C.N.Y., 6 F.Supp. 409.

Tax assessment

Assessment by New Jersey state board of tax appeals was held not "order of administrative body" within statute requiring three-judge federal district court to enjoin enforcement of order of administrative body of state.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. of New Jersey v. Martin, D.C.N.J., 19 F.Supp. 63.

Order of railroad commission

The statute has been held to apply to a suit for a preliminary injunction against enforcement of an order of a state railroad commission on the ground that it violates the federal Constitution.—Ex parte Northern Pac. Co. v. Public Service Commission of New York, Second Dist., D.C.N.Y., 268 F. 558.

Order of local officers

City police officers and prosecuting attorney for city court were held not to be administrative board or commission within statute.—Green v. Hart, D.C.Conn., 41 F.2d 854.

Under earlier statute

Before the amendment to the statute by act of March 4, 1913, c 160, 37 U.S.St. at L. p 1013, it was only in the case of a state statute that the three-judge court was required, the statute having no application to a mere order of a board or commission.—Michigan State Telephone Co. v. Odell, D.C.Mich., 288 F. 139.

10. U.S.—Rorick v. Board of Com'rs of Everglades Drainage Dist., Fla., 59 S.Ct. 808, 307 U.S. 208, 83 L.Ed. 1242, vacating, D.C., 24 F.Supp. 458.

pal ordinance,[11] or in the case of an order of a local board,[12] even though, in the case of an ordinance, it was enacted pursuant to a state plan applicable to many localities.[13]

A three-judge court is unnecessary where the attack for unconstitutionality is merely against acts based on a statute whose validity is not attacked.[14] Likewise, it has been held that the three-judge court need not be convened when the constitutionality of a mere department regulation is involved,[15] unless the invalidity of the regulation is based on the invalidity of the statute under which the regulation was promulgated.[16] However, in the case of an administrative order of a board or commission, it has been authoritatively settled by the supreme court that the need for, and jurisdiction of, a three-judge court exists, regardless of whether the case involved the constitutionality of the statute under which the board or commission acted.[17]

Reason for rule

An ordinance cannot be considered as included within the word "statute."—Borges v. Rates fixed by board

An application for a preliminary injunction in a suit to enjoin a municipal board, authorized by the city charter and a city ordinance to regulate telephone rates, from maintaining or prescribing rates so low as to be confiscatory is not within the statute, no attack being made on the constitutionality of any statute. —City of Dallas v. Dallas Telephone Co., C.C.A.Tex., 272 F. 410, certiorari denied 42 S.Ct. 50, 257 U.S. 638, 66 L.Ed. 410, and appeal dismissed 42 S.Ct. 185, 257 U.S. 668, 66 L.Ed. 426.

"An attack on lawless exercise of authority in a particular case is not an attack upon the constitutionality of a statute conferring the authority, even though a misreading of the statute is invoked as justification."—Phillips v. U. S., Okl., 61 S.Ct. 480, 484, 312 U.S. 246, 85 L.Ed. 800, vacating, D.C., U. S. v. Phillips, 33 F.Supp. 261.

Reason for rule

(1) The enforcement of a statute, within the meaning of the statute, is not sought to be enjoined merely because a state official seeks shelter under it by way of defense against a charge of lawlessness.—Phillips v. U. S., supra.

(2) On its face, the statute precludes a reading which would bring within its scope every suit to restrain the conduct of a state official whenever some enactment may be said to authorize the questioned conduct.—Phillips v. U. S., supra.

Acts claimed to be required or authorized

Suits to enjoin state officers from doing acts which are claimed to be authorized and required by the state statutes and constitution have been held properly determinable by the statutory court.—Cox v. McNutt, D. C.Ind., 12 F.Supp. 355—Powers Mercantile Co. v. Olson, D.C.Minn., 7 F. Supp. 865.

U.S.—Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Railroad Commission of South Carolina, D.C.S.C., 280 F. 901.

Unconstitutional result

Petition which seeks an injunction on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the result obtained by the use of the state statute which is not attacked as unconstitutional does not require a three-judge court, since in such a case the attack is aimed at allegedly erroneous administrative action.—Ex parte Bransford, Ariz., 60 S.Ct. 947, 310 U.S. 354, 84 L.Ed. 1249.

Motion to dismiss complaint

It is not necessary to convene three judges to hear motion to dismiss on merits bill to enjoin insurance commissioner from revoking foreign company's license, where preliminary injunction sought is not to restrain enforcement of unconstitutional statute.—Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, N. J., v. King, D.C.S.C., 54 F.2d 941.

15. U.S.—Sweeney v. State Board of Public Assistance, D.C.Pa., 36 F. Supp. 171, appeal denied 36 F.Supp. 973, affirmed, C.C.A., 119 F.2d 1023.

Reason for rule

The attack on a regulation is aimed only at administrative action, not an invalid statute.—Sweeney v. State Board of Public Assistance, supra.

Reason for rule

"The amendment inserted after the words 'enforcement or execution of such statute' the words 'or in the enforcement or execution of an order made by an administrative board or commission acting under and pur-

judge court where it is sought to enjoin enforcement of a federal statute on the ground of unconstitutionality, it is unnecessary to convene such a court in the case of an attack on a federal administrative regulation or order.[18]

Acts of state officers. In the case of a state statute, the three-judge court is necessary, and can take jurisdiction, only if a preliminary injunction is sought against enforcement of the statute by state officers.[19] There is no need for such a court in the case of local officers,[20] unless the local officers suant to the statutes of such State' but did not change the statement of the ground, which still reads 'the unconstitutionality of such statute.' So if the section is construed with narrow precision it may be argued that the unconstitutionality of the order is not enough. But this Court has assumed repeatedly that the section was to be taken more broadly. . . . The amendment seems to have been introduced to prevent any question that such orders were within the section. It was superfluous, as the original statute covered them. . . . But it plainly was intended to enlarge not to restrict the law. We mention the matter simply to put doubts to rest."—Oklahoma Natural Gas Co. v. Russell, Okl., 43 S.Ct. 353, 354, 261 U. S. 290, 67 L.Ed. 659.

Safety Transit Co., C.C.A.S.C., 50 F.2d 852—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Works of West Virginia, D.C.W. Va., 3 F.Supp. 791.

Requirement as of substance

The rule that statute providing for hearing before three-judge court in suit to restrain enforcement of state statute may be invoked only when the suit is one against state officers is one of substance not of form, and is not satisfied by joining as nominal parties defendant state officers whose action is not the effective means of the enforcement of the challenged statute.—Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 59 S. Ct. 709, 306 U.S. 573, 83 L.Ed. 994, dismissing appeal, D.C., Sovereign Camp, W. O. W. v. Wilentz, 23 F. Supp. 23.

Function as test

(1) The sphere of functions of state officials sued regarding the matter in issue rather than the formal status of the officials sued is decisive of question whether district court of three judges is to be convened to hear application for injunction restraining enforcement of state statute by restraining action of officers of state.—Rorick v. Board of Com'rs of Everglades Drainage Dist., Fla., 59 S.Ct. 808, 307 U.S. 208, 83 L.Ed. 1242, vacating, D.C., 24 F. Supp. 458.

(2) Thus, a state official, although localized by his geographic activities and the mode of his selection, may, when he enforces a statute which embodies a policy of statewide concern, be performing a "state function" within the statute.—Rorick v. Board of Com'rs of Everglades Drainage Dist., supra.

(3) On the other hand, a state official who is charged with duties under a state statute which is not of statewide concern is not a "state officer" within the statute.—Rorick v. Board of Com'rs of Everglades Drainage Dist., supra.

Inclusion of additional parties does not deprive three-judge court of jurisdiction, if state officers are the parties whose acts are sought to be enjoined.—Reppel v. Board of Liquidation, D.C.La., 11 F.Supp. 799.

Acts of private persons

Statute was held inapplicable to suit to enjoin acts of private persons.—Blease v. Safety Transit Co., C.C.A.S.C., 50 F.2d 852.

District attorney

In automobile dealer's suit to enjoin district attorney of New York County, N. Y., from instituting criminal prosecution under allegedly unconstitutional state statute declaring violations of codes approved under National Industrial Recovery Act to be misdemeanors, district attorney, although classified by another state statute as local officer, and chosen only by electors of county, was held "officer of state" within federal statute requiring three-judge court.—Spielman Motor Sales Co. v. Dodge, N.Y., 55 S.Ct. 678, 295 U.S. 89, 79 L.Ed. 1322, modifying, D.C., 8 F.Supp. 437.

Federal agents

(1) Suit against agents of federal government to restrain enforcement of regulations applicable to oil industry, promulgated under National Industrial Recovery Act, and to restrain exaction of penalties for violation of regulations, was held not within jurisdiction of statutory three-judge federal district court, under Jud.Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380.—Amazon Petroleum Corporation v. Railroad Commission of Texas, D.C.Tex., 5 F.Supp. 633.

(2) Note, however, that under 28 U.S.C.A. § 380 a, a three-judge court is now called for in the case of an injunction against enforcement of a federal statute on the ground of constitutionality.

Other officials held state officers

(2) State superintendent of insurance.—O'Malley v. U. S., C.C.A.Mo., 128 F.2d 676, affirming, D.C., U. S. v. Pendergast, 39 F.Supp. 189, appeal dismissed Pendergast v. U. Ed. 494, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 268, three cases, 317 U.S. 412, 87 L.Ed. 368.

(3) Members of board of commissioners of Port of New Orleans and of board of commissioners of Orleans levee district.—Reppel v. Board of Liquidation, D.C.La., 11 F.Supp. 799.

(4) Commissioner of insurance.—Liberty Nat. Life Ins. Co. v. Read, D.C.Okl., 24 F.Supp. 103.

(5) Railroad commissioners.—Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Nagle, D. C.Mont., 16 F.Supp. 532—Henderson Co. v. Thompson, D.C.Tex., 12 F. Supp. 519.

are performing a state function in the act sought to be enjoined.[21]

Presence at final hearing. Under Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, as amended, if the case is one in which a three-judge court must be convened to consider an application for a preliminary injunction, the presence of three judges at the final hearing in the action is also required.[22]

(3) Nature; Extent of Power

The special three-judge court is an enlarged district court, and broadly speaking is subject to the limitations on, and has the powers of, a regular district court.

The three-judge court is nothing more than a district court with the personnel enlarged in the particular kinds of litigation defined by the statute,[23] possessing the same powers as a regular district court.[24] It follows that, in order that a three-judge court may have jurisdiction, there must be

Board of Com'rs of Everglades Drainage Dist., D.C. Fla., 27 F.2d 377.

State officers nominal parties

Railroad's suit to enjoin collection of state taxes, in which temporary injunction was sought, was held within jurisdiction of single judge, not three-judge court, where the substantial relief sought was only against county officers, not state officers.—Pleasant v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., C.C.A.Kan., 66 F.2d 842, certiorari denied Missouri-Kansas-Texas Ry. Co. v. Pleasant, 54 S.Ct. 376, 291 U.S. 659, 78 L.Ed. 1051.

24. U.S.—Ziffrin Inc. v. Martin, supra.

Duty of judges

A three-judge court hearing application for injunction restraining enforcement of program prescribed under authority of state statute has a duty to declare the law as the judges see the law.—Brown v. Parker, D. C.Cal., 39 F.Supp. 895, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 307, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L.Ed. 315.

Equity powers

The statute providing for a federal three-judge court to hear applications for injunction against enforcement of a state statute would not be construed as denying to such court the ordinary powers possessed by and fundamental in every court of equity to protect itself and litigants before it from fraud and imposition respecting such litigation, unless clear expression of such purpose appeared in the language of the statute.—American Ins. Co. v. Lucas, D.C.Mo., 38 F.Supp. 926, denying new trial 38 F.Supp. 896.

U.S.—American Ins. Co. v. Lucas, D.C.Mo., 38 F.Supp. 926, denying new trial 38 F.Supp. 896.

Protection of constitutional rights

(1) A statutory three-judge court has jurisdiction of action to enjoin arrests and prosecutions of members of Jehovah's Witnesses under state statute.—Bevins v. Prindable, D.C. Ill., 39 F.Supp. 708.

(2) A three-judge district court was held to have jurisdiction to restrain future arrests, imprisonment, or prosecution of plaintiffs or other members of Jehovah's Witnesses under color of Kentucky statutes relating to the crime of sedition on account of distributing printed matter, but not to have jurisdiction to restrain or otherwise interfere with prosecutions or other criminal proceedings pending in Kentucky state courts under indictments set out in complaint or otherwise instituted before institution of action.—Beeler v. Smith, D.C.Ky., 40 F.Supp. 139.

(3) The statutory three-judge court had jurisdiction of suit by naturalized citizen and alien to enjoin enforcement of Pennsylvania statute requiring registration of aliens on ground of its unconstitutionality.—Davidowitz v. Hines, D.C.Pa., 30 F. Supp. 470.

Constitutionality of federal statute

A three-judge federal court had jurisdiction of action by a state to enjoin construction of dam pursuant to act of congress, where it is necessary for the court to determine constitutionality of the act.—State of Oklahoma ex rel. Philips v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., D.C.Okl., 37 F.Supp. 93, affirmed 61 S.Ct. 1050, 31 U.S. 508, 85 L.Ed. 1487.

Presumption as to powers

The statutory three-judge court is a "district court," presumably vested with all necessary and proper powers of such a court.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F. Supp. 179.

Limited jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of three-judge court to issue interlocutory injunction restraining enforcement of a state statute, or action of state officer in the enforcement of such statute or in the enforcement of an order of an administrative board acting pursuant to such statute, is limited by statute.—Latta Truck Lines v. Hargus, D.C.Mo., 29 F.Supp. 53.

Court as rate-making body

A statutory three-judge court convened to hear suit to enjoin enforcement of temporary rate order of state public utility commission was not a rate-making body.—Edison Light & Power Co. v. Driscoll, D.C. Pa., 25 F.Supp. 192, reversed on other grounds Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., 59 S.Ct. 715, 307 U.S. 104, 83 L.Ed. 1134, rehearing denied 59 S.Ct. 831, 307 U.S. 650, 83 L.Ed. 1529.

One judge acting for all

It should be noted, under Act April 6, 1943, c 210 § 3, 28 U.S.C.A. § 792, that, in an action calling for a hearing and determination by a three-judge court in the situations specified, any one of the three judges may "perform all functions, conduct all proceedings, except the trial of such action, and enter all orders required or permitted," with certain exceptions, subject to review by the full court.

Right of single district judge to issue preliminary injunction after three-judge court determines that such injunction should issue see infra § 205.

Propriety of local district judge approving bond on determination of three-judge court that preliminary injunction be issued see supra § 166 e (5).

Injunction by statutory court as to proceedings in state court see Courts § 543 b.

present such elements as would give a regular district court jurisdiction and power to issue an injunction, in addition to the circumstances which call for the convening of three judges.[25]

Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 41 S.Ct. 272, 255 U.S. 288, 65 L.Ed. 638.

Diversity of citizenship

Diversity of citizenship is not a requisite of jurisdiction by a three-judge court of an action to enjoin enforcement of a state criminal statute on the ground that the statute deprives plaintiff of rights under the federal Constitution.—Trent v. Hunt, D.C.Ind., 39 F.Supp. 373.

Jurisdictional amount

(1) Three-judge court has jurisdiction of action to enjoin enforcement of state criminal statute on constitutional grounds, regardless of amount in controversy.—Trent v. Hunt, supra.

(2) Statutory three-judge court was held to have jurisdiction of elevator company's suit to enjoin enforcement of state statute and governor's proclamation thereunder imposing embargo on shipment of grain out of state, with respect to amount in controversy, insufficiency of amount not being clearly shown.—Grandin Farmers' Co-op. Elevator Co. of Grandin, N. D. v. Langer, D.C.N.D., 5 F.Supp. 425, affirmed Langer v. Grandin Farmers' Co-op. Elevator Co. of Grandin, N.D., 54 S.Ct. 772, 292 U.S. 605, 78 L.Ed. 1467.

Irreparable injury

(1) Question before court on motion for temporary injunction against enforcement of state statute is whether enforcement of statute pending final hearing would inflict irreparable injury.—Mayo v. Lakeland Highlands Canning Co., Fla., 60 S. Ct. 517, 309 U.S. 310, 84 L.Ed. 774, reversing, D.C., Lakeland Highlands Canning Co. v. Mayo, 28 F.Supp. 44.

(2) A suit brought before statutory three-judge court to restrain enforcement as to plaintiff of raisin marketing program adopted under California Agricultural Prorate Act was within the equity jurisdiction of the court, where complaint alleged and evidence showed threatened irreparable injury to plaintiff's business and threatened prosecutions.—Parker v. Brown, Cal., 63 S.Ct. 307, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L.Ed. 315, reversing, D.C., Brown v. Parker, 39 F.Supp. 895.

Need for relief

(1) Jurisdiction properly assumed may be lost by a three-judge court where it appears that a prerequisite such as need for relief against state officers is lacking.—Ex parte Bransford, Ariz., 60 S.Ct. 947, 310 U.S. 354, 84 L.Ed. 1249.

(2) A statutory three-judge court would not restrain city officials from enforcing Connecticut statute prohibiting breaches of the peace on ground that city officials misapplied statute, or that statute was in conflict with federal Constitution, since such questions could be raised in criminal prosecution trial where there would be an ample opportunity for a review of the federal questions presented.—Watch Tower Bible & Tract Soc. v. City of Bristol, D.C.Conn., 24 F. Supp. 57, affirmed 59 S.Ct. 246, 305 U.S. 572, 83 L.Ed. 361.

(3) Where, at time of motion for temporary injunction to restrain state industrial board from proceeding under state Workmen's Compensation Law, board had only issued appearance notices to plaintiff employer and to workmen injured, or representatives of workmen killed, in steamer explosion, it was held that there was no such present and pressing danger to plaintiff as to warrant granting of temporary injunction.—Albee Godfrey Whale Creek Co. v. Perkins, D.C.N.Y., 6 F. Supp. 409.

Speedy remedy in state court

(1) Under the judicial code, the three-judge court would have no jurisdiction to issue a temporary injunction against the enforcement of an order of a state board or commission if a plain, speedy, and efficient remedy in the state courts should be available.—Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., Pa., 59 S. Ct. 715, 307 U.S. 104, 83 L.Ed. 1134, reversing, D.C., Edison Light & Power Co. v. Driscoll, 25 F.Supp. 192, rehearing denied Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., 59 S.Ct. 831, 307 U.S. 650, 83 L.Ed. 1529.

(2) With respect to jurisdiction of statutory three-judge district court of suit to enjoin temporary rate order of Pennsylvania public utility commission, utility's remedy at law by appeal would be ineffective to protect utility's position pendente lite, since supersedeas would not postpone application of temporary rate.—Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., supra.

(3) Under provision of the judicial code prohibiting injunction to stay proceedings in state court, and injunction against collection of a state tax where state courts provide plain, speedy, and efficient remedy, persons in possession of whisky by virtue of chattel mortgage could not maintain suit in three-judge federal court to restrain attachment proceedings in Kentucky circuit court to collect alcohol beverage tax, and to prevent disposing of the whisky attached, although court's equity powers to aid in foreclosure of mortgage were incidentally invoked.—Kohn v. Central Distributing Co., Ky., 59 S.Ct. 689, 306 U.S. 531, 83 L.Ed. 965.

(4) Since the Pennsylvania state courts afford plain, speedy, and efficient remedy by suit for injunction to restrain the collection of an unconstitutional or illegal tax, the federal three-judge court has no jurisdiction of such suit.—Guerra v. City of Philadelphia, D.C.Pa., 30 F.Supp. 791.

Substantial federal question

(1) In a case seeking to restrain enforcement of a state statute or order, or a federal statute, a three-judge court must be convened, and such a court may take jurisdiction, only if a substantial federal question is presented.—California Water Service Co. v. City of Redding, Cal., 58 S.Ct. 865, 304 U.S. 252, 82 L.Ed. 1323, affirming, D.C., 22 F.Supp. 641.

(2) The question before three-judge court on motion for temporary injunction against enforcement of state statute, where no answer or motion to dismiss had been filed, was not whether the statute was constitutional, or whether enforcement agency had complied with the statute, but whether the showing made raised serious questions under federal Constitution and state law.—Mayo v. Lakeland Highlands Canning Co., Fla., 60 S.Ct. 517, 309 U.S. 310, 84 L.Ed. 774, reversing, D.C., Lakeland Highlands Canning Co. v. Mayo, 28 F.Supp. 44.

Restrictions on district court generally

The restrictions against the issuance of an injunction by a district court contained in the judicial code apply also to the three-judge court.—Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., 59 S.Ct. 715, 307 U.S. 104, 83 L. Ed. 1134, reversing, D.C., Edison Light & Power Co. v. Driscoll, 25 F. Supp. 192, rehearing denied Driscoll v. Edison Light & Power Co., 59 S.Ct. 831, 307 U.S. 650, 83 L.Ed. 1529.

Restrictions in Price Control Act

(1) By express provision of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942,

When the three-judge court has been convened, it has the power and duty to determine its jurisdiction as such court,[26] and may dismiss the complaint if it should find the elements of jurisdiction lacking.[27]

Once a statutory court is properly convened, it is not restricted to the question of constitutionality, but may consider the cause in all its aspects,[28] it being necessary, in the case of a state statute or administrative order in which the application for a preliminary injunction is properly pressed to a hearing, that the final hearing in the action be held before the three-judge court.[29] Stated otherwise, once the three-judge court is properly convened, its jurisdiction continues until the end, or at least as long as the application has not been withdrawn.[30]

50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, the federal district court, among others, was deprived of jurisdiction to restrain enforcement of such statute, such restriction being applicable to the three-judge district court.—Lockerty v. Phillips, D.C.N.J., 49 F.Supp. 513—Henderson v. Kimmel, D.C.Kan., 47 F.Supp. 635.

(2) Thereunder, only the emergency court of appeals and the supreme court might pass on validity of regulation promulgated under the act, and statutory three-judge court was limited in its consideration of the act, to question of constitutionality thereof.—Henderson v. Kimmel, supra.

Res judicata

(1) A decision by the circuit court of appeals, affirming order of Bituminous Coal Commission denying producer's application for exemption on ground that his coal was not bituminous with respect to which supreme court denied certiorari, was "res judicata" in suit by producer against collector of internal revenue to enjoin collection of tax under the Bituminous Coal Act, and hence three-judge court had no jurisdiction to determine whether producer's coal was "bituminous."—Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, Ark., 60 S.Ct. 907, 310 U.S. 381, 84 L.Ed. 1263.

(2) Where state supreme court had upheld constitutionality of particular statute, its judgment was res judicata, and a subsequent action in three-judge court to enjoin enforcement of such statute was equivalent to an appeal from the state court, and hence was improper, since plaintiff's remedy was appeal to the United States supreme court.—Baker Driveaway Co. v. Hamilton, D.C.Pa., 29 F.Supp. 693.

Elements of jurisdiction held present

U.S.—Pavel v. Pattison, D.C.La., 24 F.Supp. 915—Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Industrial Commission of Minnesota, D.C.Minn., 24 F.Supp. 370.

26. U.S.—Joyner v. Browning, D.C. Tenn., 30 F.Supp. 512.

Averments of bill control

In determining question of jurisdiction as a court of three judges, court was limited to the averments of unconstitutionality contained in bill, and affidavits filed in support of, and against, the bill could not be considered.—Joyner v. Browning, D. C.Tenn., 30 F.Supp. 512.

Determining limits of jurisdiction

A three-judge court should avoid determining or declaring limits of its power, if not necessary for its decision, and leave performance of that duty to supreme court.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179.

27. U.S.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, supra.

As affected by power of single judge

Power of single trial judge to dismiss injunction suit on ground of absence of indispensable party is not necessarily inconsistent with similar power in three-judge court after it has convened, and unnecessary participation of two additional judges would not invalidate the court's action in any event.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, supra.

Absence of federal question

(1) In the absence of such a question the special court should dismiss the complaint.—California Water Service Co. v. City of Redding, Cal., 58 S.Ct. 865, 304 U.S. 252, 82 L.Ed. 1323, affirming, D.C., 22 F.Supp. 641.

(2) The lack of substantiality in a federal question may appear either because it is obviously without merit or because its unsoundness so clearly results from previous decisions of the supreme court as to foreclose the subject, with respect to applicability of statutes providing for three-judge courts in suits for injunctions restraining enforcement of state statutes or orders or federal statutes on ground of unconstitutionality.—California Water Service Co. v. City of Redding, supra.

Under earlier statute

(1) Prior to the amendment of the Judicial Code § 266, of Febr. 13, 1925, there were cases holding that the special court was convened only for the sole purpose of determining the application for the preliminary injunction.—Public Service Ry. Co. v. Board of Public Utility Commissioners, D.C.N.J., 276 F. 979, appeal dismissed Board of Public Utility Com'rs of State of New Jersey v. Public Service R. Co., 45 S.Ct. 9, 266 U.S. 636, 69 L.Ed. 481—J. & A. Freiberg Co. v. Dawson, D.C.Ky., 274 F. 420, affirmed Dawson v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 41 S. Ct. 272, 255 U.S. 288, 65 L.Ed. 638.

(2) Such court had no power either to sustain or deny a motion to dismiss the suit.—J. & A. Freiberg Co. v. Dawson, supra.

(3) Thus, it was held that, it being doubtful whether officers were state officials, in such a sense as to justify a hearing on an application for temporary injunction three-judge court would merely deny the application for temporary injunction, and, although complainant appeared entitled to no relief, would leave the question of the denial of the bill for determination of the judge of the district.—Silvey v. Commissioners of Montgomery County, D.C.Ohio, 273 F. 202.

28. U.S.—Healey v. Murnaghan, D. C.N.Y., 34 F.Supp. 203.

"Nor do the existence of other grounds of federal jurisdiction and the fact that the court placed the final decision on nonconstitutional grounds affect the jurisdiction of the statutory three-judge court."—Brucker v. Fisher, C.C.A.Mich., 49 F.2d 759, 761, dismissing appeal, D. C., Fisher v. Brucker, 41 F.2d 774.

29. U.S.—Smith v. Wilson, Tex., 47 S.Ct. 385, 386, 273 U.S. 388, 71 L. Ed. 699.

Reason for rule

"The specific purpose of the amendment to section 266 [28 U.S.C. A. § 380] . . . was to end the anomalous situation in which a single District Judge, on the final hearing might reconsider and decide questions already passed upon by the three judges on the application for an interlocutory injunction."—Smith v. Wilson, supra.

30. U.S.—Brucker v. Fisher, C.C.A. Mich., 49 F.2d 759, dismissing appeal, D.C., Fisher v. Brucker, 41 F.2d 774.

Defendant's voluntary consent to inaction by state officers in lieu of preliminary restraining order, or interlocutory injunction, should not divest three-judge court of jurisdiction.—Brucker v. Fisher, supra.

Restraint in exercise of power

That three-judge court has power

Once convened, the court has power to determine every question involved in the litigation,[31] pertaining to the prayer for an injunction,[32] local as well as federal,[33] and including preliminary matters inextricably tangled with others which the court is required to decide.[34] It has jurisdiction and power to determine the issues raised by the pleadings as well as the application for a temporary injunction,[35] even though the court should first determine that the statute whose constitutionality is chal-

to act does not necessarily mean that it should act, and judicial restraint may be commendable where assertion of power might be destructive of a well-defined purpose of law or declared public policy.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179.

On refusal of injunction

Statutory three-judge federal court had jurisdiction to entertain proceeding to restrain Agricultural Prorate Commission and its zone agent from putting into effect California State Prorate Act on the ground that such act violated the federal Constitution, and to receive full recital of facts in trial of the issues, although it refused to issue an interlocutory injunction.—Mutual Orange Distributors v. Agricultural Prorate Commission of California, D.C.Cal., 30 F. Supp. 937.

32. U.S.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179.

Reason for rule

A three-judge federal district court has jurisdiction to determine every question involved in the litigation pertaining to prayer for injunction, in order that a single lawsuit may afford final and authoritative decision of the controversy between the parties.—Public Service Commission of Missouri v. Brashear Freight Lines, Mo., 61 S.Ct. 784, 312 U.S. 621, 85 L.Ed. 1083, reversing, C.C.A., 114 F.2d 1, certiorari granted 61 S.Ct. 392, 311 U.S. 642, 85 L.Ed. 410, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 938, 313 U.S. 598, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

Questions of law

Whether the industrial commission of Minnesota applied standards set up in Minnesota Minimum Wage Law, whether it acted within or beyond authority conferred on it by the legislature, and whether its proceedings satisfied constitutional demands of due process, were appropriate questions for judicial decision, and constituted questions of law which three-judge federal court was required to decide.—Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Industrial Commission of Minnesota, D.C.Minn., 24 F.Supp. 370.

Question of state court's jurisdiction

Whether Kentucky circuit court had jurisdiction of attachment suit to recover Kentucky alcohol beverage tax by levy on whisky which was in possession of holder of chattel mortgage thereon was question for that court, to be determined in the attachment suit, rather than for three-judge federal district court in suit to restrain the proceedings.—Kohn v. Central Distributing Co., Ky., 59 S.Ct. 689, 306 U.S. 531, 83 L.Ed. 965.

Construction of state statute

In suit for injunction on ground, among others, of unconstitutionality of state law, three-judge court may determine case as one of statutory construction without deciding constitutional question.—Fisher v. Brucker, D.C.Mich., 41 F.2d 774, appeal dismissed, C.C.A., Brucker v. Fisher, 49 F.2d 759.

Substantial federal question involved

(1) If the three-judge court has jurisdiction because a substantial federal question is presented, the court may consider and determine purely local questions.—California Water Service Co. v. City of Redding, Cal., 58 S.Ct. 865, 304 U.S. 252, 82 L.Ed. 1323, affirming, D.C., 22 F. Supp. 641—Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, N. J. v. Beha, D.C.N.Y., 30 F.2d 539, affirmed Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, N. J. v. Conway, 49 S. Ct. 184, 278 U.S. 580, 73 L.Ed. 517.

(2) It has been said, however, that the court is not required to decide such questions.—Firemen's Ins. Co. of Newark, N. J. v. Beha, supra.

34. U.S.—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179.

Preliminary motions

When a three-judge court is properly convened in an injunction case, it has inherent jurisdiction to deal with preliminary motions filed before or after the order convening the court. Under such power it may grant a motion to dismiss the complaint because of a defect in venue.—Hudson & M. R. Co. v. U. S., D.C. N.Y., 28 F.Supp. 137.

35. U.S.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Garrett, Ky., 34 S.Ct. 48, 231 U. S. 298, 58 L.Ed. 229—Sovereign Camp, W. O. W. v. Wilentz, D.C. N.J., 23 F.Supp. 23, appeal dismissed Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 59 S.Ct. 709, 306 U.S. 573, 83 L.Ed. 994—Sovereign Camp, W. O. W. v. Murphy, D.C.Iowa, 17 F.Supp. 650.

On application for preliminary injunction

(1) On an application for an interlocutory injunction, the court is not required to determine finally the issues of law tendered by the pleadings.—Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Industrial Commission of Minnesota, D.C.Minn., 24 F.Supp. 370—Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Georgia, D.C.Ga., 213 F. 27, 129 C.C.A. 613, affirmed 36 S. Ct. 260, 240 U.S. 324, 60 L.Ed. 669.

(2) Where complainant waives his prayer for an injunction pendente lite and goes to trial on the merits, one judge may try and decide the case.—Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Georgia, supra.

Dismissal of suit

The statutory three-judge district court had jurisdiction to entertain motion to dismiss suit to enjoin enforcement of Alcoholic Beverage Control Law of Kentucky, where it was necessary, in passing on sufficiency of pleading, to determine whether or not statute contravened federal constitutional provisions.—Ziffrin, Inc., v. Martin, D.C.Ky., 24 F. Supp. 924.

Stipulation for submission

Although three-judge federal district court had jurisdiction of suit attacking constitutionality of rules of Texas railroad commission relating to oil wells, any other questions between plaintiff and intervening oil companies presented by pleadings were to be decided by sitting judge of district in accord with agreement.—Whittington v. Smith, D.C.Tex., 16 F.Supp. 448.

Piecemeal decision unnecessary

lenged is not applicable.[36]

Improper convening of court. If the court has been convened in a case not coming within the terms of the statute, it nevertheless has power to dispose of the cause as a regular district court, within the limits of the jurisdiction of such a court,[37] although it is not required to do so,[38] and the better practice in such a case would seem to require the case to be remanded for disposition by a single judge of the district court.[39]

§ 169. —— Preliminary Injunction

a. In general
b. Judges absent or under disability

a. In General

Statutory authority must ordinarily exist for a court or judge to have power to issue a preliminary or temporary injunction.

The jurisdiction or power of a court or judge to issue a preliminary or temporary injunction is purely statutory, and a matter of legislative grant,[40] and without such a statute a court or judge ordinarily has no such power.[41] This power is not

36. U.S.—Modern Woodmen of America v. Casados, supra.

37. "No limitation appears in the statute upon the power of the special court to act with reference to such preliminary questions."—Osage Tribe of Indians v. Ickes, D.C.D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179, 184.

Jurisdiction in emergency court of appeals

A landlord, who sought relief from an order of the administrator of the Office of Price Administration fixing rentals in a defense area as authorized by Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, should have sought relief through a protest or petition for adjustment, and if aggrieved by the administrative decision, through a complaint filed with the emergency court of appeals, as provided by statute, and a statutory three-judge court was without power to award relief to the landlord, a regular district having no such power.—Henderson v. Kimmel, D.C.Kan., 47 F.Supp. 635.

Jurisdiction of court not affected

(1) The fact that three judges were present in a proceeding that did not require three judges would not affect the court's jurisdiction. —O'Malley v. U. S., C.C.A.Mo., 128 F.2d 676, affirming, D.C., U. S. v. Pendergast, 39 F.Supp. 189, appeal dismissed Pendergast v. U. S., 62 S.Ct. 116, 314 U.S. 574, 86 L.Ed. 465 and O'Malley v. U. S., 62 S.Ct. 116, 314 U.S. 574, 86 L.Ed. 465, and certiorari granted Pendergast v. U. S., 63 S.Ct. 41, 317 U.S. 608, 87 L.Ed. 494, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 268, three cases, 317 U.S. 412, 87 L.Ed. 368.

(2) Such fact does not invalidate the proceedings.—Cannonball Transp. Co. v. American Stages, D.C.Ohio, 53 F.2d 1050.

(3) Thus where three-judge federal district court issued temporary injunction restraining Missouri officials from enforcing Missouri Bus and Truck Law, but court dissolved injunction on final hearing, the fact that it was mistakenly assumed that defendants' motion for assessment of damages and costs against plaintiffs and their injunction bond sureties should be passed on by the district judge in association with the two judges previously called did not of itself invalidate the district court's judgment dismissing the motion.—Public Service Commission of Missouri v. Brashear Freight Lines, Mo., 61 S.Ct. 784, 312 U.S. 621, 85 L. Ed. 1083, reversing, C.C.A., 114 F.2d 1, certiorari granted 61 S.Ct. 392, 311 U.S. 642, 85 L.Ed. 410, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 938, 313 U.S. 598, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

(4) However, it has also been held that the decision of the court must be that of the single district judge in whose court the action originated, not that of a majority of the three judges.—Cannonball Transp. Co. v. American Stages, supra.

Reason for rule

"The nature of the special tribunal of three judges justifies its questioning critically concerning character of any case of which it is called upon to take jurisdiction, and it should refuse to enter upon the trial of matters of which it is not required to take cognizance."—Public Service Commission of State of Missouri v. Brashear Freight Lines, C. C.A.Mo., 114 F.2d 1, 3, certiorari granted 61 S.Ct. 392, 311 U.S. 642, 85 L.Ed. 410, reversed on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 784, 312 U.S. 621, 85 L.Ed. 1083, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 938, 313 U.S. 598, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

Defect of parties

(1) Where United States, although an indispensable party, was not joined in action by Indian tribe to restrain secretary of interior from paying gas and oil royalties to county treasurer, three-judge court would not act on motion to dismiss the complaint, but remitted the case to single judge for appropriate action.—Osage Tribe of Indians, D.C. D.C., 45 F.Supp. 179, 185.

(2) "The limitations of the statute would be defeated were it enough to keep three judges assembled that a plaintiff could resort to a mere form of words in his complaint, with no support therefor in fact or law . . . 'when it becomes apparent that the plaintiff has no case for three judges . . . their action is no longer prescribed' . . . and in such a case the statute contemplates that a court of three judges shall not continue to act."—Osage Tribe of Indians, supra.

Affirmative showing of jurisdiction

It has been held that a temporary injunction or restraining order should not be granted until it affirmatively appears that the court has jurisdiction.—Ames v. Kruzner, 1 Alaska 596—32 C.J. p 289 note 18. Allowance at chambers or in vacation see supra § 168 e.

41. Tex.—Ex parte Richards, 155 S. W.2d 597, 137 Tex. 520—Willacy County Water Control & Improvement Dist. No. One v. Nussbaum, Civ.App., 155 S.W.2d 1023.

even, inherently, a part of the jurisdiction of a court of equity.[42] However, under the various statutes the power has been vested in courts of general chancery jurisdiction,[43] in which the action is pending,[44] or in judges thereof,[45] or in other designated judges,[46] or court commissioners,[47] or surrogates.[48]

Judges of courts of limited jurisdiction have been granted power to award injunctions with respect to actions in courts of more general jurisdiction.[49] It has been held, however, that a court having no jurisdiction to grant the final relief asked cannot issue an injunction pendente lite.[50]

Once the jurisdiction of a court is properly invoked, it cannot by arbitrary or erroneous order deprive itself of its jurisdiction to pass on an application for a temporary injunction.[51]

Being a matter of legislative grant, the legislature may impose conditions or restrictions on the exercise of the power,[52] the court having no power to issue the injunction unless the conditions on the exercise thereof are satisfied.[53]

Three-judge federal district court. The treatment of the three-judge district court in 32 Corpus Juris p 290 § 464 was based on the Judicial Code § 266, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, which calls for the assembling of such a court only if an interlocutory injunction is sought in the cases specified. However, since the enactment of the act of August 24, 1937 c 754 § 3, 50 St. at L. p 752, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380 a, a three-judge court must be convened in the cases specified also where a permanent injunction is sought. Accordingly, such court and its jurisdiction and powers are considered supra § 168 g.

Appellate courts. While, as already shown supra § 168 f appellate courts or judges are ordinarily not vested with original jurisdiction in the matter of granting injunctions, express authority being necessary for the exercise of such jurisdiction, such a court may in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction award an injunction for the purpose of protecting the subject matter of the appeal,[54] and preserving the status quo of the parties in their relation thereto,[55] so that the judgment rendered will not be ineffectual.[56] Nevertheless, the power to issue the injunction should not be exercised unless it is indispensable to the protection of the rights of the party asking it.[57]

b. Judges Absent or under Disability

In case of the absence or disability of the judge to whom an application for a temporary injunction should be made, the power to issue it may, under statutory authority, be exercised by another judge, or a court clerk, or court commissioner.

Within constitutional limits,[58] statutes may provide, and frequently have provided, for the issuance of an injunction by another judge in the event of the absence or disability of the judge to whom an application for injunction should ordinarily be made.[59] Some of the statutes provide for the issuance of the injunction in such a case by a clerk of court,[60] or court commissioners.[61]

Unless the conditions prescribed by statute for the allowance of an injunction by a judge other than the one to whom the application should ordinarily be made exist, an injunction issued by any other judge is void;[62] and his authority to issue an injunction must be exercised in strict accordance with the terms of the statute.[63]

A statute providing that an injunction may be granted by "the District Court or any judge thereof" does not authorize a district judge to grant temporary injunctions throughout the state irrespective of whether the judge of the court in which the action is brought is absent or incapacitated.[64]

county in which suit for injunction must be brought is designated by statute, the statutory requirement must be complied with and a suit for an injunction cannot be brought in any county other than the one so designated;[66] and this is so, although defendants, or part of them, reside in another county.[67] Such statutes are applicable only to cases brought clearly within their provisions;[68] and it has been held that these statutes apply only to a strict bill of injunction, and not to bills seeking other relief to which the injunction sought is merely ancillary.[69] An application for an injunction in aid of an equitable remedy should be made in the same court where the suit is pending.[70]

Venue in injunction actions as dependent on general principles or venue statutes generally is considered in the C.J.S. title Venue § 38, also 67 C.J. p 67 note 20-p 68 note 53.

Waiver. Where a case within the jurisdiction of the court is shown, a statutory privilege granted defendant to be sued in a particular county may be waived by him.[71]

b. Injunctions to Stay Proceedings at Law

Depending on the particular statute, suits for injunction to stay proceedings at law may or must be brought in the county where the proceedings are pending.

Under some statutes suits for injunction to stay proceedings at law may be brought in the county where the proceedings are pending,[72] although no defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed resides there,[73] provided no relief is prayed as to

to be sued for injunction in county claimed as residence; the district court of county, in which husband in lawful custody of children resided, having jurisdiction to restrain such kidnapping.—Wright v. Wright, Tex.Civ.App., 285 S.W. 909.

Under chancery rule, an application for an injunction should be made in the locality where the cause of action arose.—Scranton Button Co. v. Neonlite Corporation of America, 149 A. 369, 105 N.J.Eq. 708.

Injunction against receiver

(1) A suit for injunction against a receiver should be brought in the county of a receiver's residence, or in the county where the corporation, for which a receiver has been appointed, had its principal office.—Texas Gas Utilities Co. v. City of Uvalde, Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W.2d 750.

(2) County court had jurisdiction to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiff's possession of his automobile, if plaintiff's automobile was not same automobile for which receiver was appointed by county court of another county.—Alexander v. Morrison, Tex.Civ.App., 65 S.W.2d 393.

Several defendants matters not included in such proceedings.[74]

Under other statutes, suits for injunction to stay proceedings at law must be brought in the county where the proceedings are pending;[75] but this requirement does not apply when the application for the injunction is a mere incident to other relief, to which the injunction sought is merely ancillary.[76] The statutes under consideration apply only to suits in equity which have for their main purpose the enjoining of proceedings at law.[77]

§ 171. Time to Sue, Limitations, and Laches

a. In general
b. Limitations
c. Laches

a. In General

A bill for injunction may be brought before the commencement of a suit at law, pending suit, or after decision by the highest law tribunal. A suit for an injunction must not be brought prematurely.

A bill for injunction may be entertained in equity before the commencement of a suit at law,[78] pending such suit,[79] or after its decision by the highest law tribunal.[80] Where a statute so provides, the pendency of a petition before an administrative agency or officer would not preclude the officer from seeking an injunction to enforce its order.[81]

Prematurity. A suit for an injunction must not be brought prematurely.[82] Prematurity of an injunction suit to restrain state officers from tabulating returns and promulgating the result of an election has nothing to do with the jurisdiction of the court before which it is brought; these questions go to the merits and not to the jurisdiction.[83]

b. Limitations

A suit for an injunction must be brought within an applicable statute of limitations.

Where a statute of limitations is applicable, a suit for an injunction must be brought within the prescribed period.[84]

c. Laches

(1) In general
(2) Determination of laches
(3) Delay in conjunction with other circumstances
(4) Excuse for delay

(1) In General

Where a party is guilty of laches or unreasonable delay in applying for an injunction, he may thereby forfeit his claim to such remedy.

It is a well-established rule in equity[85] that, if a party is guilty of laches or unreasonable delay in applying for an injunction, he may thereby forfeit his claim to that special form of remedy.[86] The mere lapse of time, independent of the statute of limitations, may under some circumstances be a sufficient ground for denying an injunction unless a legal excuse for such delay is shown.[87] However, mere delay will not ordinarily defeat the remedy by injunction in support of a legal right, unless it has been continued so long, and under such circumstances, as to defeat the right itself,[88] or where the right of complainant is clear and the injury is of a character which would entitle him to call on a court of equity to interfere without first resorting to law;[89] and in general mere delay short of the period of the statute of limitations will not suffice to constitute laches if the parties have not changed their relative positions.[90]

Period of limitations
Under ordinary circumstances, a suit for an injunction will not be stayed for laches before, and will be stayed after, the time fixed by the analogous statute of limitations at law; however, if unusual conditions or extraordinary circumstances make it inequitable to allow the prosecution of such suit after a briefer, or to forbid its maintenance after a longer, period than that fixed by the statute, equity will not be bound by the statute, but will determine the extraordinary case in accordance with the equities which condition it. —Wright v. Scotton, 121 A. 69, 13 Del.Ch. 402, 31 A.L.R. 1162, affirming Scotton v. Wright, 117 A. 131, 13 Del.Ch. 214.

Inexcusable delay
In suit for a mandatory injunction to require the removal of structures that encroached on adjoining land, defendant could not complain of delay of adjoining landowner in seeking injunctive relief, where such delay did not extend beyond the time limited by statute for bringing suit, even if delay was inexcusable, if it did not work to his disadvantage.—

Laches cannot be urged as a defense to a suit to enjoin a wrong which is continuing in its nature,[91] or where the laches was not in any way prejudicial to the party setting it up,[92] or where reasonable efforts have been made to obtain settlement;[93] nor is laches necessarily a bar to the right to an injunction where the facts of the case were such as to appeal to the conscience of a court of equity,[94] or where a matter of public interest is involved.[95]

There is authority that delay will not constitute a bar, although complainant has suffered a considerable time to elapse where he has frequently protested to defendant against the doing of the act sought to be enjoined.[96] However, there is also authority that it is immaterial that complainant made assertions of right if no legal steps were taken to establish them,[97] and that a mere threat to take legal proceedings is insufficient to exclude the consequences of laches or acquiescence.[98]

There may be laches in the failure to prosecute with diligence an injunction suit actually commenced as well as by delay in commencing such suit.[99]

In accordance with rules discussed in Equity § 114, the principle of laches may[1] or may not[2] be applicable to the government and its higher officials.

(2) Determination of Laches

Whether injunction is barred by laches or unreasonable delay must be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

There is no hard and fast rule as to what constitutes laches barring injunction.[3] As a general rule, whether the remedy is barred must be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[4] In any event, complainant cannot be held guilty of laches where he acted with such promptness as the circumstances permitted.[5]

(3) Delay in Conjunction with Other Circumstances

Delay in conjunction with other circumstances will frequently operate as a bar to the right to an injunction.

Delay in conjunction with other circumstances will frequently operate as a bar to the right to an injunction.[6]

Assent or acquiescence. When, in addition to the lapse of time, complainant assents by word or conduct to the adverse claim or injurious conduct of defendant, he will as a general rule be deprived of his right to the interference of a court of equity by injunction,[7] at least until after he has established his right at law.[8] However, the remedy by injunction should not be withheld if it appears that complainant's delay in bringing suit has not been such as to show assent to the acts complained of and to their consequences.[9] The acquiescence which will bar a complainant from the exercise in his favor of the discretionary jurisdiction by injunction must be such as proves his assent not only to the acts of defendant, but also to the injuries to himself which have flowed or can reasonably be anticipated to flow from those acts.[10] Acquiescence in past continuing injuries does not estop one suffering therefrom from enjoining their future continuance.[11]

Whether the right to injunctive relief is affected by acquiescence depends on the circumstances of each case.[12]

Prejudice to defendant. A suitor who by laches has made it impossible[13] or very difficult[14] for a court to enjoin his adversary without inflicting great injury on him will be left to pursue his ordinary legal remedy. A court of equity will not grant relief by injunction where the party seeking it, being cognizant of his rights, and the invasion thereof, does not take those steps to assert them which are open to him, but lies by and suffers his adversary to incur expenses and enter into burdensome engagements which would render the granting of an injunction against the completion of his undertaking, or the use thereof when completed, a great injury to him.[15] This rule is especially applicable where the object of the injunction is to restrain the completion or use of public works, and where the granting of the injunction will operate injuriously to the public as well as to the party against whom the injunction is sought.[16] The government and quasi-public corporations may avail themselves of the rule as fully as an individual.[17] However, it is essential that complainant should have known of the acts complained of; otherwise the fact that large sums had been expended by defendant will not prevent the award of an injunction.[18]

Prejudice to third persons. When complainant has improperly delayed action until the rights of third persons have intervened and an injunction cannot be granted without substantial injury to such rights, an injunction will be denied[19] on grounds of public policy.[20]

(4) Excuse for Delay

Laches will not bar an injunction if a legal excuse for the delay is shown.

Laches will not bar complainant's right to an injunction if a legal excuse for the delay is shown.[21] For instance, where he has used due diligence and investigated every fact suggested by the surrounding circumstances, ignorance of an essential fact will excuse delay.[22]

Delay pending other proceedings may be excusable.[23]

necessary parties.[27]

Jurisdiction to make particular persons parties is to be determined by the allegations of the pleadings.[28] A plea that a third person is an indispensable party should be overruled where the answer contains evidence refuting the claim on which the contention is based.[29]

All the parties to a contract ordinarily are indispensable parties to a suit to enjoin its performance or enforcement[30] or its breach.[31]

The owners of a judgment or decree are necessary parties to an action to enjoin its enforcement.[32]

Beneficial interests in land. If the injunction is sought to protect an interest in lands, all persons who have a beneficial interest in the land which is the subject matter of the suit should be made parties.[33]

Where an injunction is sought relating to rights in a private or municipal corporation, all persons should be made parties whose legal or equitable interests will be affected by the decree prayed for.[34]

Purchasers, mortgagees, creditors, and others having an interest in the subject matter, which interest was acquired before the institution of the suit for injunction, are necessary parties.[35]

Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F. of Tennessee, C.C.A.Tenn., 41 F.2d 326.

Exceptions to rule. As the object of the rule is to enable the court to administer justice, the court should not permit it to become an instrument for the denial of justice to parties before the court who are entitled to relief.[36] Where it is not practicable to join all the necessary parties, as by reason of their being beyond the process of the court, the court may make such a decree as it can without them.[37]

Purchasers pendente lite. Where title in the subject matter is acquired pendente lite, the party claiming such title need not be joined, but is bound by the decree.[38]

The joinder of unnecessary parties will not prevent the maintenance of the action,[39] as it is without material effect except as to the matter of costs.[40]

§ 174. —— Complainants

Generally all persons interested in the controversy which is the subject of an injunction suit are proper parties, but, where it is impractical to make all of a great many interested persons parties, the court will permit one or more, if their interest fairly represents those not in court, to institute the action on behalf of all concerned.

The general and fundamental rule as to parties in injunction suits is that all persons interested in the controversy which is the subject of the suit should be made parties and such persons are manifestly proper parties.[41] As appears supra § 22, in case the right whose violation is complained of is a public right, it is essential that complainant have some special interest different from that of the public in general, to authorize him to maintain the suit.

Government; public officer. If the government is obstructed in exercising its powers and discharging its duties, it has a right to apply to its courts for any proper assistance by way of injunction; it is the proper party complainant because of its interest in promoting the general welfare.[42] However, the attorney general is not the proper plaintiff to enforce private, as distinguished from public, rights.[43] The state, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, is not a necessary party to a suit to enjoin a corporation from making an improper use of a corporate name.[44]

Suits to enjoin breach of contract. Ordinarily one who is not a party to a contract is not a proper party plaintiff to maintain a suit to enjoin a breach of the contract;[45] but it has been held that a person for whose benefit a restrictive agreement was made is a proper party plaintiff to a suit to enjoin the breach thereof,[46] and that, where the seller of a business covenants not to engage in the same business in the same town for a designated period and the buyers are succeeded by a corporation which carries on the business, the corporation alone may sue to restrain the seller from violating the covenant, although the original buyers are the sole stockholders in the corporation.[47]

Suits by one or more in behalf of all. Where the suit is one in which a great many individuals are interested, and it is impractical to make them all parties, the court will permit one or more of the persons so interested to institute the action in behalf of all the persons concerned,[48] in order to prevent multiplied and useless litigation.[49] The interest of those who sue must be of such a character as fully and fairly to represent those not in court,[50] and the bill should expressly state that it is filed as well on behalf of such other persons as of those who are actually made plaintiffs.[51]

§ 175. —— Defendants

a. In general
b. United States; governmental subdivisions
c. Public officers
d. Private corporations or associations or officers thereof; stockholders
e. Persons to whom payment of money is sought to be enjoined
f. Persons to whom issuance of bonds is sought to be enjoined
g. Tort-feasors
h. Persons participating in fraud forming basis of suit
i. Persons in representative capacity or represented by others
j. Principal, agents, or employees

a. In General

Persons whose interests will be affected by the decree or without whom a complete settlement of the questions involved could not be attained are proper parties defendant. Persons without whose joinder no effectual decree could be rendered for the complainant are necessary or indispensable parties defendant, as are all persons not plaintiffs who have such an interest that any decree adjudicating the rights of those before the court must necessarily affect their rights; but persons wholly without interest in the suit are neither necessary nor proper parties defendant, and persons whose presence is not essential to a complete settlement of the questions involved, and whose rights will not be affected by the decree, need not be joined.

All persons whose interests will necessarily be affected by the decree,[52] or without whose presence a complete settlement of the questions involved in the action could not be attained,[53] are properly joined as defendants.

Persons without whose joinder no effectual decree could be rendered in complainant's favor are necessary or indispensable parties defendant,[54] since

Holders of bonds or other evidences of debt

(1) In suit against city to enjoin issuance and sale of bonds as invalid, persons who had purchased bonds before bill was filed were necessary parties, especially where city had already spent part of proceeds of sale.—Alabama Power Co. v. Persons contracting with public official

All persons with whom a public official might contract, "if he exercised the discretion vested in him by the statute, were not indispensable parties to the determination of the question whether the statute had lawfully conferred such discretionary power upon the official in question;" thus, to a suit to restrain the leasing of Indian land by the secretary of the interior, on the ground of want of authority to make such leases, a person to whom the secretary proposes to make such a lease is not a necessary party defendant.—Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock, App. D.C., 23 S.Ct. 115, 117, 187 U.S. 294, 47 L.Ed. 183.

In suit to restrain secretary of the interior from putting into effect order requiring state to show nonmineral character of land or have its claim rejected, homestead entrymen who have settled on such lands are not indispensable parties.—Work v. State of Louisiana, 46 S.Ct. 92, 269 U.S. 250, 70 L.Ed. 259, modifying Fall v. State of Louisiana, 287 F. 999, 58 App.D.C. 22.

against whom no relief is sought and whose rights will not be affected by the outcome of the suit.[59] Even persons who are interested in the controversy but whose rights are separable from those of the parties before the court, and who will not be directly and necessarily affected by the decree, are not indispensable parties, and the court may proceed to a decree without them,[60] but they are proper parties and may be joined so that a complete decree may be rendered.[61]

b. United States; Governmental Subdivisions

The United States may or may not be a proper or necessary party defendant in actions for injunctions. Where the interests or property rights of a governmental or civil subdivision, such as a municipal corporation, will be affected if an injunction is granted, generally it should or must be made a party defendant.

Where the interests or property rights of a governmental or civil subdivision, such as a municipality, county, or school district, will be affected in case the injunction asked for is granted, generally it is held that it should or must be made a party defendant.[62] However, such an entity is not an indispensable party where there is no attempt to divest it of a right or to impose an obligation on it,[63] or where it has no substantial interest in the subject matter of the litigation,[64] or a practical and effective decree may be rendered without making it a party.[65] A municipality is not a proper party to a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance passed by a board of health which under the state laws is a public agency holding entirely independent of municipal control; and this is so even though the two exercise authority over the same territory in their different spheres.[66]

As representative of all concerned. In a suit to enjoin enforcement of an ordinance fixing rates for public service commissions, the municipality prop-

Suit between states

In a suit by a state to enjoin another state from enforcing a statute compelling companies handling natural gas to prefer local customers over interstate customers, pipe line companies, against whom complainant state makes no complaint and seeks no relief, and who will evidently continue to supply gas, if not restrained or prevented, are not necessary parties.—Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. c. Public Officers

(1) In general

(2) Officers executing process of court

(1) In General

Where a superior official's legal power to issue a particular order or regulation is involved, or his subordinate exceeds the bounds of such order or regulation, the latter may be enjoined without joining the superior. The judge or judges of the court in which an action at law is pending ordinarily should not be made a party or parties to a suit to stay the proceedings.

Where a statute or regulation is challenged as being unlawful or unconstitutional, an injunction will lie only against the person or agency charged with the enforcement thereof.[70] It has been said that the law on the question whether a subordinate official may be enjoined from transgressing his authority without joining his superior is not clear, nor is it clear how far the decisions on the subject may be generalized;[71] likewise it has been said that there is considerable discord in the decisions as to whether a court may enjoin a subordinate official of an administrative officer without joining the latter as a party, where the subordinate's offending acts result from carrying out a mandate of his superior.[72] However, the rule has been laid down that where the legal power of the superior to issue the particular order or regulation is involved,[73] or where the subordinate exceeds the bounds of the order or regulation under which he is acting,[74] the subordinate may be enjoined without joining his

Held not necessary or indispensable party

(1) Suit by state to restrain secretary of the interior from putting into effect order requiring state to show nonmineral character of land or have claim rejected is not one against United States, even though it still retains title to lands, and it is not an indispensable party.—Work v. State of Louisiana, 46 S.Ct. 92, 269 U.S. 250, 70 L.Ed. 259, modifying Fall v. State of Louisiana, 287 F. 999, 53 App.D.C. 22.

(2) In action to enjoin alleged tortious misconduct of officials of government railroad in interfering with plaintiff's business of lightering ships by preventing plaintiff from using a dock necessary to that business, the government was not an indispensable party, even though action involved question as to whether the United States or city owned dock, since the action could conclude nothing against the United States.—Berger v. Ohlson, C.C.A.Alaska, 120 F.2d 56.

(3) A suit to enjoin district engineer and contracting officer of United States from doing a thing which was unlawful and unauthorized would not be a "suit against the United States" but a suit against the defendant engineer and contracting officer as an individual in which it would be unnecessary to join the United States.—Noce v. Edward E. Morgan Co., C.C.A.Ark., 106 F.2d 746.

Action by state court

The superior court of California is without jurisdiction to declare invalid an order of an executive officer of the United States, such as the secretary of agriculture, in a proceeding to which officer is not a party, especially when enforcement of a statute is exclusively in officer's hands, and an order of the officer cannot be declared invalid by the court indirectly by interdicts directed against subalterns who may have some duty to perform in conjunction with orders issued by officer.—U. superior in the action; on the other hand, where the superior's legal authority to issue the particular order or regulation is not challenged, but only the manner in which he exercises it, the superior is a necessary party to an action to restrain the subordinate,[75] as he is where the subordinate is merely carrying out an order of his superior, without exercising any independent discretion.[76]

Where a suit is brought to restrain action in behalf of a municipality, the officers whose duty it is to perform the acts sought to be enjoined are proper,[77] and usually necessary,[78] parties.

Judges. Since an injunction to stay proceedings at law acts on the parties to the cause and not on the court or tribunal in which the action is pending,[79] the judge or judges thereof ordinarily should not be made a party or parties to the injunction suit.[80] It is improper to make a probate judge a party to a suit in chancery to enjoin the settlement of an estate pending in his court.[81]

(2) To proceeding to enjoin officers appointed by secretary from proceeding against milk dealers for violation of license issued by secretary under agricultural adjustment act.—Darger v. Hill, C.C.A.Cal., 76 F.2d 198, affirming, D.C., Hill v. Darger, 8 F. Supp. 189.

(3) To proceedings by handlers of citrus fruit to enjoin enforcement of order issued by secretary regulating handling of citrus fruit.—Chester C. Fosgate Co. v. Kirkland, D.C. Fla., 19 F.Supp. 152.

(4) To proceeding to enjoin control committee, selected in manner provided in marketing agreement and license issued by secretary under agricultural adjustment act, from enforcing committee regulations governing citrus industry.— Yarnell v. Hillsborough Packing Co., C.C.A.Fla., 70 F.2d 435, 92 A.L.R. 1475.

(5) In suit to enjoin examination of dairy company's books by committee appointed by secretary under agricultural adjustment act.—Royal Farms Dairy v. Wallace, D.C.Md., 7 F.Supp. 560.

(6) To a suit by judgment creditor to restrain county administrative assistant from delivering to judgment debtor a rental check drawn by secretary of agriculture in favor of debtor in payment of amount due debtor for complying with federal government's conservation program, where secretary of agriculture did not claim any interest, did not ask to be made party, and it was conceded that neither United States nor any of its agencies claimed to have any interest.—Tilmon v. Adkisson, 162 S.W.2d 903, 204 Ark. 436.

87. Held necessary or indispensable party

(1) To a suit for injunction to compel the secretary and an Indian agency superintendent acting under his direction to disburse funds under Act March 3, 1921, § 4, payment of which to complainant had been refused under Rev.Stats. § 2087.—Webster v. Fall, Okl., 45 S. Ct. 148, 266 U.S. 507, 69 L.Ed. 411.

(2) To a taxpayer's suit to restrain action on bids for construction of building under authority of emergency relief appropriation act.— Carr v. Desjardines, D.C.Okl., 16 F. Supp. 346.

(3) In suit to enjoin agents or subordinates from refusing to deliver quantity of water to which plaintiffs claimed they were entitled by virtue of contracts with United States.—Moore v. Anderson, C.C.A. Wash., 68 F.2d 191, certiorari denied Anderson v. Moore, 55 S.Ct. 78, 293 U.S. 567, 79 L.Ed. 666, and Graham v. Moore, 55 S.Ct. 78, 293 U.S. 567, 79 L.Ed. 666.

Held not necessary or indispensable party

(1) To suit by Indian allottees to enjoin enforcement of regulations by secretary as in excess of his power. —Eastman v. U. S., D.C.Wash., 28 F.Supp. 807.

(2) To suit to enjoin federal officers from trespassing on petroleum producers' properties and enforcing petroleum code and secretary's regulations requiring production reports.—Ryan v. Amazon Petroleum Corporation, C.C.A.Tex., 71 F.2d 1, reversing, D.C., Amazon Petroleum Corporation v. Railroad Commission of Texas, 5 F.Supp. 639, and certiorari granted Amazon Petroleum Corporation v. Ryan, 55 S.Ct. 102, 293 U.S. 539, 79 L.Ed. 645, reversed on other grounds 55 S.Ct. 241, 293 U.S. 388, 79 L.Ed. 446. Followed in, C. C.A., Ryan v. Panama Refining Co., 71 F.2d 8, certiorari granted Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 55 S.Ct. 83, 293 U.S. 539, 79 L.Ed. 645, reversed on other grounds 55 S.Ct. 241, 293 U.S. 388, 79 L.Ed. 446.

88. Held indispensable party

U.S.—Jewel Productions v. Morgenthau, C.C.A.N.Y., 100 F.2d 390.

89. Held not necessary or indispensable party

(1) A bidder for levee work could maintain suit against district engineer and contracting officer of United States to prevent him from making charge against bidder on theory that bidder had defaulted on bid for doing levee work where engineer had attempted to accept conditional bid as though it were unconditional, as against contention that secretary of war was indispensable party.—Noce v. Edward E. Morgan Co., C.C.A.Ark., 106 F.2d 746.

(2) In action in three-judge federal court to enjoin construction of dam pursuant to contract with war department authorized by act of congress, secretary of war is not a necessary party if the act is unconstitutional.—State of Oklahoma ex rel. Phillips v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., D.C.Okl., 37 F.Supp. 93, affirmed 61 S Ct. 1050, 313 U.S. 508, 85 L.Ed. 1487.

90. Administrator of N. I. R. A.

In suit to enjoin United States attorney from enforcing penalties under national industrial recovery act for violating administrator's orders attacked as being arbitrary and capricious, court was held without jurisdiction to consider such ground of attack in absence of administrator.—Hart Coal Corporation v. Sparks, D.C.Ky., 9 F.Supp. 825.

Collector of customs; members of department of agriculture

In suit to enjoin detention of food shipment, collector of customs holding shipment and members of department of agriculture who instigated exclusion were properly made defendants.—Knapp v. Hyde, D.C.N. Y., 50 F.2d 272.

Prohibition commissioner was not necessary party to suit to enjoin collector of internal revenue from refusing to honor application for withdrawals of specially denatured alcohol.—Wilson v. Bowers, D.C.N.Y., 14 F.2d 976.

Mayor; governor; adjutant general

(1) Governor is indispensable party as respects application for interlocutory injunction against enforcement of state laws.—Arneson v. Denny, D.C.Wash., 25 F.2d 993.

(2) Where, at request of mayor of city, governor of state sent state National Guard to take charge of district wherein plaintiff's plant was located and the troops took possession of plaintiff's property, the mayor, governor, and an adjutant general of state in charge of National Guard were necessary and proper parties to suit to enjoin interference with plaintiff's use of property.—Strutwear Knitting Co. v. Olson, D.C.Minn., 13 F.Supp. 384.

Municipal finance commission

In suit attacking constitutionality of state statute in so far as it affected enforceability of complainant's school bonds issued by board of education of borough and seeking to restrain the state municipal finance commission from functioning in the school district, so as to prevent levy or execution against the school district, members of the municipal finance commission were "proper, necessary, and indispensable parties" because of the supervisory control over the municipality.—Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., v. Wilentz, D.C.N.J., 23 F.Supp. 23, 28, appeal dismissed Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 59 S.Ct. 709, 306 U.S. 573, 83 L.Ed. 994.

Peace officer; picketing

In suit to enjoin picketing, where there was no charge of the commission of any acts of violence or trespass, labor anti-injunction statute did not require that peace officer be made a party, since there was no necessity for inquiry as to whether such officer was willing or able to protect plaintiff's property.—Wiest v. Dirks, 20 N.E.2d 969, 215 Ind. 568.

School officials

(1) In suit to enjoin county school trustees from changing school district boundaries, county superintendent was not necessary or proper party.—School Trustees of Jackson County v. Edna Independent School Dist., Tex.Civ.App., 9 S.W.2d 506, affirmed, Com.App., 34 S.W.2d 860.

(2) Members of board of directors of school district were properly made defendants as individuals in suit to restrain them from carrying out provisions of invalid statute creating school district.—Harris v. Rush, 8 S.W.2d 366, 157 Tenn. 295.

(3) In suit by ousted superintendent of independent school district to prevent interference with his position and to restrain making of any payments to superintendent's successor out of school funds, successor was held "interested party" and required to be made party to hearing on the merits; but failure to make successor a party did not render temporary injunction void as to those against whom it was issued, where temporary injunction maintained status quo, notwithstanding some of its provisions may have been too indefinite to be enforceable. —Temple Independent School Dist. v. Proctor, Tex.Civ.App., 97 S.W.2d 1047, error refused.

State attorney general; secretary of state; election commissioners

(1) State attorney general held an indispensable party as respects application for interlocutory judgment against enforcement of state laws.—Arneson v. Denny, D.C.Wash., 25 F. 2d 993.

(2) An action to restrain secretary of state from taking any action in the filing of referendum petition, in which attorney general was joined as a defendant, is premature as to the latter, as he could not act until after the petition had been filed.—State v. Sullivan, 224 S.W. 327, 283 Mo. 546.

(3) Secretary of state held necessary party to suit to prevent her from counting alleged illegal election returns and to compel county canvassing board to perform ministerial duties.—Leslie v. Griffin, Tex.Civ. App., 23 S.W.2d 534.

(4) Suit could not be maintained against secretary of state, attorney general, and election commissioners to restrain them from permitting election of general assembly under invalid redistricting act, where they had no duty to perform respecting enforcement and practical operation of act.—Stiglitz v. Schardien, 40 S. W.2d 315, 239 Ky. 799, followed in Myre v. Lewis, 40 S.W.2d 322, 239 Ky. 788.

State labor relations board is not a proper party in employer's action to restrain trade union from carrying out threat to submit testimony before board regarding charges of unfair labor practices which allegedly occurred prior to an adjustment of controversy between the union and the employer.—United Baking Co. v. Bakery and Confectionery Workers' Union Local 221, 9 N.Y.S.2d 964, 170 Misc. 199, affirmed 14 N.Y.S. 2d 74, 257 App.Div. 501.

Subordinate disbursing officer

Philippine scout's suit to compel payment of retirement pay was held properly brought against army's chief of finance, subordinate disbursing officer, from whom payment was first sought, not being indispensable, even though he might have been proper party.—Miguel v. McCarl, 54 S.Ct. 465, 291 U.S. 442, 78 L.Ed. 901, modifying McCarl v. Miguel, 66 F.2d 564, 62 App.D.C. 259, certiorari granted Miquel v. McCarl, 54 S.Ct. 102, 290 U.S. 618, 78 L.Ed. 540.

Treasurer of Puerto Rico held proper party to suit to restrain criminal proceedings under joint resolution, it being unnecessary to join attorney general or people of Puerto Rico.—Gallardo v. Questell, C.C.A. Puerto Rico, 29 F.2d 897.

When trustees of an agricultural college are charged with the enforcement of a law relative to fertilizer, they are properly named as defendants in suit to enjoin the enforcement of the law.—National Fertilizer Ass'n v. Bradley, D.C.S.C., 18 F.Supp. 263, affirmed 57 S.Ct. 748, 301 U.S. 178, 81 L.Ed. 990.

Where superintendent of public service signed county's name to contracts for employment of attorneys by commissioners to collect delinquent taxes, but superintendent neither authorized contracts nor participated in payment of funds, and no relief could be prayed against him, superintendent was not necessary party defendant to informations filed by state's attorney to enjoin payment of county funds to attorneys so employed.—People ex rel. Courtney v. Ashton, 192 N.E. 820, 358 Ill. 146.

(2) Officers Executing Process of Court

Authorities differ as to whether officers, such as sheriffs, enforcing the process of the court are proper or necessary parties to a suit to enjoin such enforcement.

According to a number of authorities, sheriffs,[91] clerks of court,[92] or notaries public[93] are neither necessary nor proper parties defendant to a suit to enjoin the enforcement of orders, judgments, or processes in their hands; but a contrary view is taken in other decisions which hold that a sheriff is a proper,[94] and, according to others, a necessary,[95] party defendant to a suit to enjoin such proceedings, in order that he may be bound by the judgment and be protected by it;[96] and it has also been held that a court commissioner who is directed to execute the court's decree of sale is a necessary party to a suit to enjoin the sale.[97] Under a statute providing that in certain actions all citations and other legal process shall be made on the sheriff, the sheriff is a necessary party defendant in such an action.[98]

d. Private Corporations or Associations or Officers Thereof; Stockholders

The general principles determining who are proper or necessary parties defendant in actions for injunction apply to private corporations or associations and their officers, and to stockholders.

Corporation as party defendant. Where it is obvious that a corporation will not join in a stockholder's suit to enjoin a transfer of stock, it is properly made a party defendant.[1] Where several defendants who have incorporated are sued as individuals, and the acts complained of are threatened by the corporation, the corporation is a necessary party defendant.[2] Where a corporation has a de facto, but not a de jure, existence, suit may be brought against it in its corporate name.[3] A religious corporation should be made a party to a bill to restrain unauthorized acts of its trustees; but, where an injunction has issued, the failure to make it a party is not necessarily a fatal defect.[4]

Officers as defendants. Officers of a corporation are not necessary parties defendant when it is not shown that they, independent of the corporation, are doing or threatening to do the injury complained of,[5] or where no relief is prayed for as to any of the officers that is not prayed for with respect to the corporation;[6] nor is a former officer of a corporation a necessary party where no relief is sought against him, and neither his rights nor his liabilities will be affected if defendant prevails, while if plaintiff prevails the damages for which he may be liable for false representation will be diminished.[7] An officer against whom mandamus is the proper remedy, to obtain the performance of his duty, is not properly joined in a suit to enjoin the corporation.[8]

On the other hand, officers of a corporation are proper parties to an action to enjoin violation by a corporation of its contract,[9] or to enjoin the use by the corporation of plaintiff's trade-name,[10] and an officer who is interested, and actively engaged, in the business of a corporation is properly named as a defendant in a bill to enjoin it after expiration of a contract permitting it to use complainant's name in advertising.[11] Where a corporation is made a party defendant, the officers or members thereof may be made defendants for the purpose of compelling discovery by them.[12]

An action by policyholders against a mutual insurance company to enjoin it from buying land, when such purchase is a violation of its charter, should be brought against the officers and trustees of the company and not against the company itself.[13]

Stockholders as defendants. When some of the

A sheriff's successor is properly a party where a portion of the relief sought is to have declared void a subsequent execution sale of the same property under another judgment against the same judgment debtor, and to restrain the sheriff from executing any certificate of sale or deed based on such sale.—Butler v. stockholders seek to enjoin a corporation from paying an extra dividend, the other stockholders are necessary parties.[14]

The acts of an unincorporated association cannot be enjoined in a suit against the officers alone, in the absence of a statutory provision authorizing such procedure.[15]

e. Persons to Whom Payment of Money Is Sought to Be Enjoined

The person to whom money would be paid is a proper and, under most authorities, an indispensable party defendant to a suit to enjoin the payment of money.

Where the object of a suit is to enjoin the payment of money, the person to whom the money would be paid is a proper,[16] and, according to the weight of authority, an indispensable,[17] party defendant; but there are decisions in which it is either said[18] or held,[19] without discussion or statement of reasons, that the payee is not a necessary party. In a suit to enjoin payment of warrants for construction work delivered by a city to a bank pursuant to assignment of the contractor, where the bank had sold and transferred the warrants before suit, it was not a proper party defendant, no personal judgment being sought against it.[20]

f. Persons to Whom Issuance of Bonds Is Sought to Be Enjoined

According to most authorities, in suits to enjoin the issuance of municipal bonds the persons to whom they are to be issued, or enough of them to represent the interests of all, should or must be made parties.

In suits brought to enjoin the issuance of municipal bonds, the weight of authority is that the persons to whom the bonds are to be issued,[21] or a sufficient number of them fully to represent and protect the interests of all,[22] should or must be made parties defendant; but there are decisions to the effect that they need not be joined.[23]

g. Tort-Feasors

In a suit to enjoin tortious acts, it is proper, but not necessary, to join all the tort-feasors as defendants.

Where the acts sought to be enjoined are tortious, it is proper to join as defendants all the tort-feasors,[24] even though there was no concert or unity of design among them.[25] However, in a suit to enjoin tortious acts, it is not necessary to join all the tort-feasors as defendants,[26] since a person receiving injury from the tortious acts of others has a remedy against one or all of the tort-feasors and may enforce that remedy against one or all at his election,[27] either at law or in equity.[28]

h. Persons Participating in Fraud Forming Basis of Suit

Where the right to relief is based on fraud, all persons charged with participating in the fraud, and those who will benefit by it, are properly joined as defendants.

Where fraud is the gravamen of complainant's right to relief, all persons who are charged with having participated in the alleged fraud are properly joined as defendants;[29] and those who will be the beneficiaries of the fraud are also proper parties.[30] another need not be joined when the act to be enjoined affects the representative as such.

It is unnecessary to join as defendants persons who are fully and legally represented by another when the act to be enjoined affects the representative in his capacity as such,[31] provided the representative has duly qualified[32] and there is no conflict of interest between the representative and the person he represents.[33] Where such a conflict exists, the representative may be a necessary defendant in a suit for injunction brought by the person represented.[34]

Where the act to be enjoined does not affect the representative in his capacity as such, he need not be joined as a party.[35]

j. Principal, Agents, or Employees

An agent, servant, or employee of a person doing or causing a wrong ordinarily is not a necessary party, but should be made such where permitted to exercise independent discretion; and an injunction may be sought against him where the principal cannot be reached with process.

The action for injunction should be brought against the person doing or causing the wrong to be done and not against his agents, servants, or employees, the latter persons not being necessary parties,[36] although it has been said that the court may in its discretion permit them to be joined.[37] Where, however, the agent or servant is permitted to exercise an independent judgment or discretion, he should be made a party;[38] and where the principal is out of the jurisdiction, or cannot be reached with process, an injunction may be sought against the agent.[39]

a. Complainants

(1) In general
(2) Wrongful act doing common injury to many

(1) In General

As a general rule, persons having distinct and separate claims or rights cannot join as complainants in a suit for injunction; but all persons among whom there is a unity of interest in the subject matter of the suit and who are entitled to, and seek, the same character of relief may so join.

As a general rule, persons having distinct and separate claims or rights cannot join as complain-

Remaindermen

In suit against surviving executor to enjoin ejectment action brought by him, it is unnecessary to join remaindermen whose rights must be worked out through executor.—Oil City Nat. Bank v. McCalmont, 154 A. 497, 303 Pa. 306.

Representation by state

In suit to enjoin a state from enforcing a statute requiring companies handling natural gas to prefer local consumers over interstate consumers, such local consumers are represented by the state, and need not be brought in or specially represented.—Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. State of West Virginia, 43 S.Ct. 658, 262 U.S. 553, 67 L.Ed. 1117, 32 A.L.R. 300, rehearing granted 44 S.Ct. 4, 263 U.S. 671, 68 L.Ed. 499, and reheard 44 S.Ct. 123, 263 U.S. 350, 67 L.Ed. 1144.

Local labor unions are in effect parties by representation to action against officers and business agents of unions to enjoin unlawful acts.—Willson & Adams Co. v. Pearce, 237 N.Y.S. 601, 135 Misc. 426, reversed on other grounds 265 N.Y.S. 624, 240 App.Div. 718, affirmed 191 N.E. 545, 264 N.Y. 521.

Association represented by promoters

In proceeding against an association and promoters thereof for violations of securities act, association was before the court for jurisdictional purposes where all of promoters thereof were before court, notwithstanding failure to join so-called "members" who had made contributions to enterprise allegedly carried on by association.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. ants in a suit for injunction.[40] However, there is no inflexible rule as to the joinder of parties complainant, and the rule, as far as any rule can be said to exist, is one of convenience only and must depend on its application to the circumstances of each particular case.[41] It has been held that all persons among whom there is a unity of interest in the subject matter of the suit and who are entitled to, and seek, the same character of relief may join as complainants.[42]

(2) Wrongful Act Doing Common Injury to Many

A number of persons who would be injured in their similar but separate interests or rights by a wrongful act, and who seek the same relief, may unite in a bill to restrain the commission of the act.

It is very generally held that, where a wrongful act would injure many persons in the same way, interfering with similar but separate interests or rights of each, and the same relief is sought by all of them, they may unite in a bill to restrain the commission of the act, on the ground of avoidance of a multiplicity of suits,[43] or the bill may be brought by one or more on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated,[44] or by the state on the relation of the proper officer.[45] This rule has been applied in cases of common injury to several persons resulting from the maintenance of a nuisance which is injurious to the property of all the plaintiffs;[46] from the diversion or obstruction of a stream[47] or an excessive use of its waters;[48] from the discontinuance of water service;[49] from the letting off of water from a reservoir jointly erected by plaintiff mill owners for the purpose of supplying their mills in the dry season;[50] from the enforcement of an ordinance requiring property owners to construct sidewalks, curbing, and guttering, and, on their failure to do so, authorizing the city to construct them at the expense of the property owner and making the expense a lien on the property;[51] from the enforcement of an invalid ordinance licensing plumbers and fixing a penalty for working at that trade without such license;[52] from the erection of a building in a city in violation of an ordinance to secure protection against fire which will result in a common danger to plaintiff's properties;[53] from the obstruction of a common drainage ditch[54] or of a street;[55] from the opening of a road under a void order of the county supervisors;[56] from the operation of a railroad in a street on which several properties abut;[57] from trespassing on mining property, the lessor and lessee of the property being permitted to join as plaintiffs;[58] from the turning off of gas by a gas company from the houses of plaintiffs living in the same municipality;[59] and from other wrongful acts.[60]

Treating one of plaintiffs as sole plaintiff

Where a landowner and his tenant sued for damages for flooding land and crops and to enjoin the maintenance of the nuisance causing it, but before trial the tenant assigned his claim to the landowner, and this fact was pleaded by an amendment and proved on the trial, the trial court might well treat the landowner as the sole plaintiff, although allowing the action to proceed under the original title, and a judgment for plaintiff under such conditions will not be reversed for misjoinder of parties plaintiff.—Steber v. b. Defendants

All persons threatening or performing the act sought to be enjoined may be joined as defendants; but persons having no community of interest in the subject matter of the controversy cannot be so joined.

Defendants who have a common interest and a common defense are properly joined in one suit for injunction.[61] Where the act sought to be enjoined is threatened or being performed by more than one person, all may be joined as defendants,[62] but not otherwise;[63] and persons among whom there is no community of interest with respect to the subject matter of the controversy cannot be joined as defendants.[64]

§ 177. —— New Parties

General equity rules governing the bringing in of new parties, amendment as to parties, and the substitution or intervention of parties have been applied in actions for injunctions.

It has been said that courts have inherent power to add such parties as may be affected by the result of a judgment of injunction,[65] and that whether complainants shall be permitted to remain such after transferring their interest in the property involved in the suit, and whether their grantees shall be brought in as complainants, are questions within the discretion of the court.[66]

Bringing in pending trial. If, in the course of a trial in an injunction suit, it appears that additional persons must be brought in as parties to accomplish the ends of justice, they must be brought in before the trial proceeds.[67]

Substitution. Where, after a bill is filed, some of the parties dispose of their interest in the subject matter of the suit, the court will permit the bill to be dismissed as to them and the new owners substituted in their place.[68]

When plaintiff dies, his heirs or personal representatives must be substituted as parties.[69]

Where a public officer is a party, and during the pendency of the litigation his term of office expires or he is otherwise replaced, his successor may be substituted.[70] In particular circumstances, the attorney general of the United States has been held properly substituted for the rent commission of the District of Columbia as a party defendant in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of the latter's orders.[71]

Intervention. If the decree sought will materially affect the rights or interest of a person not a party, he has a right to intervene,[72] although it has been held that within the reasonable discretion of the court conditions or requirements may be imposed on intervention.[73] In the intervening pleading the intervener may refer to the pleadings of the original parties and adopt them and join in their prayer for relief.[74]

On the other hand, where one is neither a necessary nor a proper party and a complete determination of the controversy can be had without his being joined as such, or where he has no interest in the subject matter or outcome of the suit, he will not be permitted to intervene.[75]

Intervention in corporate name

School district trustees intervening in injunction suit brought by teacher against county superintendent should intervene in their corporate name.—Isbill v. Stovall, Tex.Civ. App., 92 S.W.2d 1067.

Opposition to intervener's claim

In state's action to enjoin fraudulent practices by a corporation, wherein a party was permitted to intervene for purpose of establishing claim as a defrauded purchaser of stock, a stockholder who might be entitled to share in any surplus remaining after payment of claims of defrauded purchasers had an ostensible interest in determination on the merits of the claim of the intervener, and was entitled to an opportunity to oppose the allowance of intervener's claim.—People v. Monthly Income Shares, 31 N.Y.S.2d 527, 263 App.Div. 832.

Action reduced to one for damages

Where an injunction action has been reduced to one for damages, all parties injured by the wrongs complained of should be permitted to come into the action and set up their damages.—Utah Oil Refining Co. v. City; state

(1) "In an action in equity to restrain a contractor of a city from prosecuting a public improvement in a negligent manner . . . the city will not be allowed to intervene, where intervention is not necessary to determine the rights between the parties, where no injury to or title in real property in which the city has an interest is involved, where there can be no recovery against the city on the cause of action set forth in the complaint, or a recovery over against the city by the contractor, or by the contractor against the city."—Touhey Co. v. Shongo Const. Co., 165 N.Y.S. 420, 100 Misc. 181.

(2) In action to restrain railroad from constructing extension tracks without first obtaining a certificate of convenience and necessity from interstate commerce commission, city held not entitled to intervene.—L. Singer & Sons v. Union Pac. R. Co., D.C.Mo., 26 F.Supp. 721, affirmed, C. C.A., 109 F.2d 493, certiorari granted 60 S.Ct. 891, 309 U.S. 653, 84 L.Ed. 1002, and Kansas City, Mo. v. (3) City and state held not entitled to intervene in suit by subscribers to enjoin telephone company from discontinuing telephone service in violation of contract.—People v. Brophy, 120 P.2d 946, 49 Cal.App. 2d 15.

State labor relations board

In employer's action to restrain trade union from carrying out threat to submit testimony before state labor relations board regarding charges of unfair labor practices which to make a party plaintiff a person applying to be made such, he will be made a party defendant, where, by that being done, he can equally have the benefit of the suit.[76] A stranger to a suit whose rights have been affected unfavorably by an injunction may appear by petition and request a construction or modification of the injunction so as to preclude all risk of violation in the pursuit of rights acquired previous to its issuance,[77] or, if the court is satisfied that he has a right to be made a party, it may order that the injunction shall stand dissolved, unless plaintiff shall amend his bill by making such person a party.[78]

A petition for leave to intervene must be timely filed.[79]

Amendments. The courts have been said to be very liberal in permitting amendments as to parties in injunction suits.[80] Where a misjoinder occurs, the court may allow an amendment by striking out the parties improperly joined.[81] In case of the nonjoinder of necessary parties the court will not dismiss the bill but will permit[82] or require[83] the addition of the necessary parties, the usual order being for the case to stand over with liberty to amend by adding the necessary parties.[84] Such an amendment, when necessary to accomplish the ends of justice and secure the interests of all, may, it has been held, be made at any time,[85] and, according to some decisions, even after an injunction has been granted;[86] but there is authority which apparently limits this latter proposition,[87] and, where an injunction has been refused, the trial court has no jurisdiction to reopen the case by permitting the filing of an amended petition adding a party defendant.[88]

On the other hand, entirely new parties cannot be substituted for improper parties by amendment;[89] and an amendment of the bill will not be allowed which will in effect, by the introduction of new parties, change the aspect of the bill and amount to the institution of a new suit.[90] Where, on the allegedly occurred prior to an adjustment of controversy between the union and employer, wherein the state labor relations board asked permission to intervene, the board was not a "real party in interest."—United Baking Co. v. Bakery and Confectionery Workers' Union, Local 221, 14 N.Y.S.2d 74, 81, 257 App.Div. 501, affirming 9 N.Y.S.2d 964, 170 Misc. 199.

Illinois Bell Telephone Co., C.C.A.Ill., 111 F.2d 136, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 27, 311 U.S. 652, 85 L.Ed. 417.

Effect of amendment dropping party

In suit by optometrist and his employer, a corporation, to enjoin state board from interfering with business in which by amendment the corporation was dropped as a party, plaintiff's contention that the corporation is no longer before this court and, therefore, all averments pertaining to it are irrelevant, merits scant attention because the corporation is but the alter ego of plaintiff; although plaintiff, by his amended bill of complaint, sought to drop the corporation as a party plaintiff, yet the activities of the corporation form the gravamen of the amended bill, and are necessarily before the court.—Wagner v. allegations in the bill, plaintiff must necessarily fail even if an omitted party be brought in, an amendment will not be allowed.[91]

§ 178. —— Defects and Objections

Under a number of authorities, although not under others, a defect of parties in an injunction suit is ground for demurrer. An objection based on a defect or misjoinder of parties must be timely made, and may be waived by answer.

A defect of parties in a suit for injunction has been held not a ground for demurrer;[92] but other authority is to the contrary,[93] or holds that, where the facts showing plaintiff's lack of authority to sue appear on the face of the bill, the action may be abated by demurrer,[94] and that where a misjoinder of parties plaintiff does not appear on the face of the petition the question cannot be raised by general demurrer.[95] If the proper and necessary parties to an action for an injunction are not before the court, a decree may for this defect be reversed on rehearing[96] or on appeal;[97] but the presence of too many parties plaintiff, or a misjoinder, is not a defect of parties where some of the plaintiffs have full capacity to bring the suit.[98]

It has been said that a defect of parties in an injunction suit is waived by answer;[99] and an objection based on a defect of parties is cured or waived by their appearance and answering to the bill.[1] Such objection cannot be raised after the case has been reversed on the facts found by the court,[2] or, as appears in Appeal and Error § 265, for the first time on appeal. An objection for misjoinder of parties comes too late when made for the first time at the hearing.[3] However, an injunction suit against a defendant which is not a suable entity has been held void ab initio,[4] and its invalidity may be called to the attention of the court at any stage of the proceeding.[5]

The defect of want of parties does not go to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the suit, but goes to its discretion, as a court of equity, to entertain it.[6]

Cure of defect of parties by amendment is considered supra § 177.

§ 179. Process and Appearance

Unless defendant voluntarily appears or waives process, a final injunction can be granted only if process issues and service is made on him.

Unless defendant voluntarily appears and submits himself to the jurisdiction, it is necessary that process issue and service be made on him before

In suit to enjoin trespass, wherein it appeared that defendant had desisted from further trespass before hearing on petition, refusal to make third person a defendant, under allegation that such person took up and continued trespass committed by original defendant, was not error, in absence of allegation that third person committed trespass before suit was filed, or was acting in concert or collusion with original defendant in carrying out the latter's purpose and intent to commit trespass, or was in privity with him.—Hargroves v. "Real party in interest;" capacity to sue

In action to restrain the defendant from further doing business as a death benefit association, demurrer for want of "legal capacity to sue" would not raise a question whether the attorney general of the state was the "real party in interest;" complaint was not subject to special demurrer on ground that plaintiff did not have legal capacity to sue, where it did not disclose that there was a legal disability of plaintiff to prosecute an action.—American Home Benefit Ass'n v. the court can grant a final injunction against him.[7] The procedure may be to serve on defendant the writ of injunction and a subpœna to appear and answer,[8] and the subpœna should be returned within the time prescribed for return of service for an injunction.[9] Process may be waived;[10] thus, want or insufficiency of service of process is waived or cured where defendant voluntarily appears and answers to the bill.[11] Some authorities permit service of process, by leave of court, on an attorney, to restrain proceedings at law, when the client is out of the jurisdiction,[12] and permit the service of a cross bill on the attorney of a nonresident plaintiff.[13] Under a statute providing for service on a nonresident by publication, service on his attorney gives the court no jurisdiction.[14] An injunction against the enforcement of a judgment obtained within the state by a nonresident may be sustained by constructive service on the nonresident as a remedy in personam ancillary to the action by the nonresident.[15] Where it is sought to restrain the fraudulent sale of securities within the state by a nonresident, it has been held that under statutory provisions service of process by registered mail directed to defendant's address outside the state may be sufficient.[16]

§ 180. —— Preliminary Injunction or Restraining Order

a. Necessity of notice in general
b. Dispensing with notice
c. Requisites and sufficiency of notice
d. Waiver of notice

a. Necessity of Notice in General

The general rule is that a preliminary injunction or restraining order will not be granted until after notice of the application therefor, or an order to show cause, has been given to defendant, so that he may oppose the application.

Under the general principles of equity, as well as under some statutes and rules of court, a preliminary injunction or restraining order will generally not be granted until after notice of the application therefor, or an order to show cause, has been given to defendant so that he may oppose the

Disputed ownership of property
Court had jurisdiction to grant restraining order to preserve conditions in statu quo for reasonable time until hearing could be had on notice for injunction pendente lite, but had no jurisdiction without notice to make order pendente lite where rights of parties depended on disputed title and ownership of property.—State ex rel. Cook v. District Court of Ninth Judicial Dist. in and for Glacier County, 69 P.2d 746, 105 Mont. 72.

Enforcement of ordinance
A statute prohibiting issuance of a temporary injunction to restrain enforcement of an ordinance except on a hearing and after notice does not require notice where it is sought to enjoin an alleged improper manner of enforcing ordinance.—Ex parte Connor, 198 So. 850, 240 Ala. 327.

Nonresident defendant
The fact that the nonresidence of a defendant appeared on the face of the bill was not ground for vacation of order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue, where the order had been served on defendant within the jurisdiction. —Elgart v. Mintz, 200 A. 488, 124 N.J.Eq. 136.

Prior service of subpœna
"Issuance and service of subpœna to answer are not prerequisites to the issuance and service of an order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue."—Elgart v. Mintz, supra.

In Georgia
On application for injunction, the judge on a proper showing may grant without notice to defendant a temporary restraining order; where such order has been granted, it is the duty of the judge to cause sufficient notice to be given to defendant as to the time and place for an interlocutory hearing to be had thereon, and it is only on such hearing and after notice thereof that a temporary or interlocutory injunction may be granted.—Grizzel v. Grizzel, 3 S.E.2d 649, 188 Ga. 418.

Reasonable time for restraint
An injunction order, treated as a temporary restraining order, was effective to preserve status quo for a reasonable time necessary to enable notice to be given for hearing as to whether it should be effective pendente lite, but could not be effective pendente lite without notice or hearing, and order spent its force after lapse of reasonable time, so that, in so far as order attempted to restrain beyond reasonable time, which was long before five years after issuance of order, order was void for want of jurisdiction.—State ex rel. Cook v. District Court of Ninth Judicial Dist. in and for Glacier County, 69 P.2d 746, 105 Mont. 72.

Service on one defendant
"Where the record fails to show that certain of the defendants were never served with process and never appeared therein, but the record does show that one defendant accepted service and does not show that service was not accepted by or made upon other defendants and that one of the defendants was before the chancellor, the chancellor acquired jurisdiction to deny a temporary restraining order."—Ames v. Baker, 130 So. 11, 100 Fla. 585.

(2) Act 1924 No. 29, § 1, providing that no writ of injunction shall be issued without notice, or without opportunity for hearing governs all injunctions issuing under prior special or general acts.—Rapides Dairy Dealers' Co-op. Ass'n v. Mathews, App., 158 So. 247.

(3) Injunction issued without notice required by the statute was void and incurable.—Fussell v. Burris Bros., 126 So. 537, 12 La.App. 516—State ex rel. Baptist Hospital v. Williams, 1 La.App. 341.

(4) "The statute regulating the procedure . . . Act No. 29 of 1924, does not require the district judge to issue a rule on the defendant to show cause why an injunction should not issue, in a case where the record itself, before the district judge, shows that an injunction should not issue."—Weber v. Dawson, 133 So. 751, 753, 172 La. 213.

In Washington
"Courts issue temporary restraining orders without notice only in cases in which a satisfactory showing is made which convinces the court that the signing of such an order is required in the interests of justice and equity . . . Instances in which a restraining order would be issued without notice, the effect of which will be other than to preserve the status quo, are rare." —State ex rel. Pay Less Drug Stores defendant has answered or is otherwise before the court,[18] or where the granting of the injunction or order would result in a decision of the main questions involved,[19] or would have the effect of giving full relief on the application for interlocutory injunction,[20] or where for all practical purposes a temporary injunction could be tantamount to a permanent one.[21] Such notice is always required where there is no showing of injury likely to occur before a hearing can be had.[22]

Court rules providing as to the conditions under which a temporary restraining order may be granted without notice, and the requisites of such an order, must be substantially complied with.[23]

In at least one jurisdiction, where a temporary restraining order will afford adequate protection until notice can be given and a hearing had, it should be issued, rather than a temporary injunction without notice.[24]

Special statutory provisions. The statutes of some jurisdictions by implication permit the granting of a preliminary injunction without notice.[25] Under statute in some jurisdictions the general and ordinary business of a corporation,[26] or the operation of a railway or of a municipal corporation,[27] may not be suspended until after due notice and a hearing, and an ex parte injunction granted in such cases contrary to the statute is void.[28] Likewise, a restraining order is void if issued without the notice required by statute in a case between employer and employee growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment.[29] It has been held, however, that, notwithstanding the statute, notice need not be given where an injunction is sought to restrain a corporation from committing unlawful acts injurious to plaintiff,[30] or acts that are not within the ordinary business of the corporation or municipality,[31] or within the meaning of the words "operation of a railway."[32] A statute providing that, before the issuance of an injunction to stay any proceeding, reasonable notice in writing shall be given to the adverse party or his agent is applicable only to injunctions sued out to stay a suit, judgment, or judicial proceeding, and it is not a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the court to issue an injunction in other cases that any previous notice shall have been given to the adverse party.[33]

b. Dispensing with Notice

(1) In general

(2) Requisites and sufficiency of showing to justify writ or order without notice

(1) In General

A preliminary injunction or restraining order may be granted without notice in cases of great urgency or where irreparable injury or undue prejudice would ensue from the giving of notice. In the absence of mandatory legislation or court rule, such grant without notice rests in the court's discretion.

It has been said that only in the rarest cases is it proper to grant a temporary injunction without notice.[34] Under the general rule, as well as under some statutes, it is only in cases of great urgency or pressing necessity, or where irreparable injury or undue prejudice would ensue from the giving of notice,[35] or where the giving of notice is imprac-

Inability to serve notice

(1) Granting order for temporary injunction without notice was held proper where defendant's place of business was closed and no one was in charge, and his attorneys stated that he was out of the jurisdiction and that they had no interest in the litigation.—McDougall v. Woods, 247 Ill.App. 170.

(2) Inability to serve notice of an application for a preliminary injunction does not appear where it is not shown that one or more of the defendants could not have been served at their known business address or that plaintiff could not have left or mailed a notice as rule of court provides.—A. the sound discretion of the court,[42] and this may be done in vacation as well as in term time;[43] and the action of the court will not be reversed in the absence of an abuse of discretion.[44] Whether a temporary injunction should be granted in a particular case without notice depends on the special facts of that case.[45]

Even where an injunction is granted without notice, defendant is not bound by the injunction until properly served with notice of its issuance.[46]

(2) Requisites and Sufficiency of Showing to Justify Writ or Order without Notice

One seeking a preliminary injunction or restraining order without notice must make out a very clear case for dispensing with notice; thus, he must allege facts showing that irreparable damage would result from notice, and not merely state conclusions.

A complainant seeking the issuance of a preliminary injunction or restraining order without notice must make out a very clear case for dispensing with notice;[47] the supporting allegations have been required to be made unequivocally as existing facts, and not merely on information and belief.[48] The allegations of the bill or petition should be even more carefully considered than when defendant has been served with notice,[49] and it has been said that

Statutory provisions as to the time or contents of a notice of application for a preliminary injunction or restraining order must be obeyed; in the absence of such provision, the sufficiency of the notice is for the court to determine.

Notice of application or motion for a preliminary injunction or restraining order must be served within the time provided by rule of court or statute,[59] and, if no time is provided, then within a reasonable time.[60] In the absence of controlling statutory provisions, the sufficiency of the notice, in respect of both time and contents, must be determined by the court in the exercise of its discretion in view of the particular circumstances.[61]

d. Waiver of Notice

Want of proper notice of an application for a preliminary injunction, or want of an order to show cause, may be waived by appropriate action on defendant's part, as where he appears and resists the application.

The want of proper notice of an application for a preliminary injunction or want of an order to show cause may be waived[62] as an irregularity,[63] or as being for the benefit of defendant,[64] and is waived by defendant if he appears and resists the application by answer, motion, or affidavit,[65] or fails to object for want of notice until the case is heard on appeal;[66] whether want of notice is waived by motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction after it has been granted is considered infra § 247. No objection for want of proper notice can be raised after hearing on the merits in which an injunction has been made permanent.[67]

An injunction granted on waiver of notice is the same as one granted with notice duly served.[68]

No waiver occurs in the case of persons who appear solely for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction over them;[69] and a party's right to notice is not waived by his counsel's participation in the hearing after specific objection to proceeding without notice.[70]

Restraining enforcement of state statute
(1) Under Judicial Code § 266, as amended, 28 U.S.C.A. § 380, requiring the giving of notice to the governor and attorney general of a state of an application for an interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of a statute of such state, "no particular form of notice is required."—Consolidated Freight Lines v. Pfost, D.C.Idaho, 7 F.Supp. 629, 630, 631.

(2) Notice specifically stating "that the application of the plaintiffs for the issuance of an interlocutory injunction had been presented to the judge and a time and place for the hearing was set, and that the defendants should show cause why an interlocutory injunction should not issue enjoining them from acting under or enforcing the act involved and from collecting the licenses or registration fees thereunder" was held sufficient.—Consolidated Freight Lines v. Pfost, supra.

(3) Notice failing to inform governor "of the particular law of the state of Washington, enforcement of which was sought to be enjoined, nor of the particular official acts sought to be enjoined, nor on what ground such law was claimed to be unconstitutional, nor the time when the defendants would be served with copies of the court's order, complaint, and motion," was held insufficient.—Arneson v. § 181. Pleading

The specific applications of rules of pleading to the bill or complaint, the answer, and subsequent pleadings are considered infra §§ 182–188.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 182. —— Bill, Complaint, or Application

a. In general
b. Substance of bill
c. Prayer
d. Construction of bill or complaint
e. Filing exhibits

a. In General

For relief by injunction the applicant's case must be presented by a bill or complaint or cross bill filed in the proper court. Leave to file the bill usually is not necessary unless it is required by statute or rule of court.

A sworn bill asking specifically for an injunction in the prayer for relief, and complying with all the other formalities requisite to obtain one, is properly denominated an injunction bill.[71] For relief by injunction the applicant's case must be presented by a bill or complaint[72] or by a cross bill,[73] but it has been held that an affidavit on which the motion for injunction is based will be sufficient if it contains all the ingredients of a bill or complaint.[74] The complaint speaks as of the date of filing and continues to speak until the date of the decree.[75] The pleadings must be filed in the court specified by statute.[76] A custom of presenting a petition for an injunction to the judge prior to filing it cannot prevail over a statute requiring such petition to be filed before being acted on by the court.[77] Under a statute permitting plaintiff in an action at law to include a claim for an injunction, the claim, if not included in the declaration in the action, must be affixed to the declaration or connected with it by proper reference.[78]

Leave to file bill. Except under the early equity practice,[79] or where required by statute or rule of court,[80] leave of court to file a bill for injunction ordinarily is not necessary;[81] but even where such leave may be necessary an order to show cause[82] or the granting of a temporary injunction[83] is tantamount to sanction, or at least cures the failure to obtain sanction, before filing the bill.

b. Substance of Bill

(1) In general
(2) Certainty of averment
(3) Plaintiff's status, title, or interest
(4) Wrongfulness of defendant's acts
(5) Injury to plaintiff
(6) Inadequacy of remedy at law
(7) Defendant's inability to respond in damages
(8) Multiplicity of suits
(9) Fraud
(10) Doing or offering to do equity

(1) In General

The bill or complaint must set forth all the material facts, and it must present a statement of facts which, if true, will entitle plaintiff to the relief sought.

All the facts necessary to entitle complainant to an injunction must be set forth in the bill or complaint,[84] and matters omitted therefrom cannot be which present a case falling within some well defined or acknowledged head of equity jurisprudence and constitute a ground for equitable interposition,[87] except where jurisdiction is conferred by statute, in which case the bill need not state a case within the general equity powers of a court of chancery;[88] but complainant must bring his case within some one of the specifications in the statute authorizing the courts to take cognizance of such matters.[89] It is unnecessary to allege matters which are not essential to injunctive relief.[90] Candor and frankness are essential[91] and material facts should neither be concealed[92] nor misrepresented.[93] It is not necessary in any case that plaintiff should in his bill anticipate that which is properly a matter of defense.[94] In the determination of the sufficiency of the bill or complaint, the material allegations of the bill or complaint must be taken as true.[95]

To authorize the issuance of a temporary injunction the bill must make a prima facie case for final relief by alleging facts which, if proved and not controverted, will entitle complainant to the relief prayed for,[96] but this rule will not be vigorously applied

when the questions of law or fact to be ultimately determined in the cause are grave and difficult, the injury to the moving party would be immediate, certain, and great, and the loss or inconvenience to the opposing party would be comparatively small or insignificant, if the writ should be granted.[97] Complainant must claim and satisfactorily show that the matter out of which his asserted rights arise should be preserved and held in statu quo until the cause can be disposed of on its merits.[98] A petition which does not seek a preservation of the status quo but seeks a change of the status cannot form the basis for a temporary injunction.[99]

Jurisdiction. The allegations of the bill must show that the case presented is within the jurisdiction of the court,[1] and so, where the petitioner seeks in a federal court to enjoin the enforcement of a state statute on the ground that it contravenes the federal Constitution, the bill must allege affirmatively and distinctly whatever is essential to the three-judge federal court's jurisdiction.[2]

Where the allegations of the bill clearly present a case within the court's jurisdiction mere technical defects in the bill do not deprive the court of jurisdiction.[3]

Where injunction is ancillary to other relief. Where plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction except as ancillary to other relief, the bill must present a case showing that plaintiff is entitled to the main relief sought and must show that an injunction is essential to the principal inquiry and to the relief sought in the bill.[4] The petition for the injunction need only disclose facts showing that an injunction may be properly granted as incidental relief.[5]

Injunction against breach of contract or covenant. In accordance with the general rule, the bill or complaint must allege facts clearly entitling plaintiff as a matter of equity to injunctive relief where he seeks to enjoin the breach of an agreement or covenant,[6] such as an agreement not to engage in a competing business,[7] a sales agency con-

Where bill to enjoin seller's entering competing business, in violation of agreement, showed twelve-year statutory period had not run, pleader need not explain delay.—Kaliopulus v. Lumm, 141 A. 440, 155 Md. 30.

Petition to enjoin party from inducing breach

Complaint, alleging that ice manufacturers had induced one who, on sale of ice business, had agreed not to sell ice in certain territory, to tract,[8] an agreement between an employer and a labor union,[9] or a restrictive covenant relating to the use of real property.[10] The petition must show a valid contract[11] which has not been breached by plaintiff,[12] but an allegation of plaintiff's readiness to perform is not necessary.[13] The terms and conditions of the contract should be set out,[14] but it has been held sufficient to state merely the tenor or legal effect of the contract,[15] or to set out merely the part of the contract which forms the basis of plaintiff's right.[16] Where plaintiff seeks to enjoin defendant from violating a contract not to engage in a competing business in a certain territory, the bill must describe or otherwise sufficiently show to what territory the contract relates.[17] In a suit to enjoin the violation of a restrictive covenant relating to the use of real property it is not necessary to allege nuisance[18] or to negative possible defenses.[19]

Injunction against civil action. Where the prosecution of an action by defendant is sought to be enjoined, complainant must allege circumstances clearly entitling him as a matter of equity to the injunctive relief.[20] The complaint, in addition to al-violate his contract in order that ice manufacturers might sell such person ice, stated a cause of action as against ice manufacturer for an injunction on ground of inadequacy of damages.—Imperial Ice Co. v. Rossier, 112 P.2d 631, 18 Cal.2d 33.

ness, or occupation. The bill or complaint in a suit to restrain interference with plaintiff's trade, business, or occupation must allege facts showing that equitable relief is essential to protect plaintiff from illegal or wrongful acts of defendant.[29] A complaint to protect a business or occupation must allege an established business, not merely a contemplated business.[30]

Injunction against trespass or other injury to real property. In accordance with the general rule, a bill or complaint seeking an injunction against trespass or other injury to real property must present a statement of facts which, if true, will entitle plaintiff to the relief sought.[31] If the legal title is disputed it has been held that the petition must aver that an action at law is pending or is about to be brought to determine the title,[32] but, if plaintiff merely asserts an equitable title which is disputed, no allegation of that nature is necessary.[33] The petition must identify or describe the property concerned.[34]

Injunction by public official to restrain violation of law. The essential facts for injunctive relief must be stated in a bill or complaint by a public official to restrain the violation of a statute.[35] It is, of course, unnecessary to allege matters which

Bill alleging that defendants' airplanes in landing glided within one hundred feet of surface of plaintiffs' property, or possibly within five feet at one end of tract, was held not to state case of trespass in absence of allegation of damage, since use of airspace is lawful unless it causes injury to landowner's possession.—Hinman v. Allegations held to negative right

In suit to enjoin defendants from using automobile driveway over plaintiff's property on ground that defendants had abandoned the right of way, or, if not, had committed a trespass in obstructing the right of way on the driveway where it crossed defendants' property, plaintiff's allegation that plaintiff acquiesced in defendants' action in obstructing and destroying the easement negatived a claim of trespass, and plaintiff's allegations that defendants had relocated driveway expressly negatived an intention on defendant's part to abandon the right of way.—Dean v. are not pertinent to the violation of the particular statute or which are not essential to injunctive relief,[36] nor is it necessary to allege matters of defense.[37] Allegations in a suit to enjoin the violation of the Federal Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S. C.A. § 77 a et seq, should be as simple as those of an indictment under the provisions of the federal mail fraud statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 338.[38]

Injunctions involving labor or trade union disputes. As a general rule, where an injunction is sought in a labor or trade union dispute, the bill or complaint as a whole must present a case which clearly entitles plaintiff under equitable principles to injunctive relief.[39] Where labor disputes are governed by express statutory provisions, plaintiff must disclose a case calling for injunctive relief under the limitations and restrictions of the statute,[40] and must allege all the facts required to be shown by the statute.[41] So, in accordance with statutory requirements, plaintiff must allege that every reasonable effort to settle the dispute has been made,[42] and that local authorities would not or could not furnish adequate protection to plaintiff.[43] Such a statute is not applicable where no labor dis-

Suit to enjoin criminal prosecution

Allegations of the petition in a suit to enjoin criminal prosecutions on the ground of unconstitutionality of the act alleged to have been violated, pointing out the exact constitutional provisions claimed to have been violated, stating the facts on which plaintiffs relied, and the reasons why the act violated such provisions, were held sufficient to entitle plaintiffs to a consideration of such questions.—State ex rel. in detail,[54] and in an orderly manner,[55] and should not be left to inference,[56] as bills should be sustained on facts alleged and not on those inferred.[57] It has been said that the general rule that a bill in equity must contain a clear statement of the facts on which plaintiff relies for relief is applied rigorously to a bill for an injunction.[58] However, the plaintiff need do no more than state the facts on which he relies with reasonable certainty,[59] and general allegations may be held sufficient where, because of the nature of the case, it is difficult to plead the facts in detail.[60]

(b) Negativing Reasonable Inferences

The essential facts relied on for relief by injunction must be stated with sufficient certainty to negative every reasonable inference that the applicant is not entitled to the relief sought.

The material and essential facts relied on for relief by injunction must be stated with sufficient certainty to negative every reasonable inference arising on the facts stated, from which it might be deduced that the applicant might not, under other supposable facts connected with the subject matter, be entitled to the relief sought.[61] This rule applies the pleader is insufficient to correct a complaint which is defective for failure to allege the facts with certainty and particularity.[64] Nevertheless it has been held that, where plaintiff alleges conclusions of law merely without setting forth facts in support of them, it is competent for defendant to consent to such method of pleading, and the objection is waived by failure to demur[65] or to move to dismiss or dissolve.[66]

(d) Pleading Evidence

It is unnecessary for the bill or complaint to recite the evidence or proof.

It is sufficient that the bill apprises defendant of the precise case which he is required to meet, and it is not necessary to recite the evidence or to aver all the minute circumstances which may be proved in support of the general statement or charge in the bill.[67]

(e) Pleading on Information and Belief

As a general rule an injunction will not be granted where the material allegations are made on information and belief, but there are exceptions to the rule.

Under the general rules of equity pleading, considered in Equity § 223, an injunction usually will not be granted where the material allegations are made on information and belief,[68] unless there is annexed to the bill the additional affidavit of the person from whom the information is derived, verifying the truth of the information thus given.[69] Nevertheless, an injunction may be granted, where the information is alleged to have been obtained from defendant;[70] where the facts alleged on information are charged to rest within defendant's knowledge and not within the knowledge of plaintiff;[71] where the facts are shown by documents or records which are referred to in the bill;[72] where the bill charges fraud and prays a discovery,[73] or where the allegations on information and belief are accompanied by a sworn statement of plaintiff's informants;[74] and even this statement may be dispensed with where it is shown that it would be impossible to obtain it.[75] It has been held that an affidavit made on information and belief may be sufficient as against a defendant who has had an opportunity to deny the allegations if they are unfounded.[76] According to some decisions the fact that many or all of the material averments of the bill are stated on information and belief will not prevent the granting of an injunction after notice to defendant when defendant in no manner denies such averment,[77] especially after a demurrer to the bill had been opposed,[78] as it must be taken to admit the facts alleged on information and belief.[79]

(3) Plaintiff's Status, Title, or Interest

Plaintiff must allege clearly his status and his right, title, or interest in the subject matter of the suit.

One who asks for injunctive relief must allege his status clearly so that his right to sue can be determined,[80] and it is not sufficient that it may be inferred from an exhibit attached to the bill.[81] Likewise he must show clearly in his bill or complaint a right, title, or interest in the subject matter of the suit which warrants his seeking relief against defendant's acts.[82] Where the injury complained of is one which is suffered by the general public, the Petition by purchaser showing nonperformance of contract to purchase did not authorize injunction against vendor.—Warren v. Harrison, 139 S.E. 549, 164 Ga. 777.

Establishment of property as "community property"
In suit by divorced wife to enjoin divorced husband from attempting to deprive her of her share of the community property, by a fictitious proceeding to secure the dissolution of a business operated by husband under the assumed name of a corporation, allegation that all the property used in the operation of the business was acquired during the marriage and subsequent to the expiration of the corporation's charter established that the property was "community property" and disclosed a cause of action.—In re F. H. Koretke Brass & Mfg. Co., 196 So. 917, 195 La. 415.

Plaintiff unlawfully using city streets for business
A petition to enjoin city from enforcing ordinance prohibiting operation of sound trucks was demurrable even if ordinance were inapplicable or invalid where plaintiff's private business conducted exclusively upon streets and public ways of city without its consent and in defiance of prior ordinance, constituted an unlawful appropriation of city's streets.—Maupin v. bill must show a special interest in complainant distinct from the public.[83] Plaintiff will not be assumed to have any other or better title than that which is asserted in the bill.[84]

Sufficiency of pleadings setting up title. According to some decisions it will be sufficient to allege generally title in plaintiff without setting out the several steps by which the title was perfected,[85] and without attaching title papers to the petition,[86] at least when the general allegations of title are not qualified or otherwise rendered insufficient by other averments in the pleading.[87] Other decisions have reached the opposite conclusion and hold that plaintiff must set forth his title with particularity,[88] and where he claims under paper title he should exhibit his title papers or copies thereof.[89] A rule requiring complainant to deraign his title has been held to be one of practice and of convenience and not a matter of jurisdiction, and after answer, may be dealt with by the court in its sound discretion.[90]

Possession. If possession is essential to the cause of action for injunction, possession must be alleged,[91] but title or ownership need not be alleged.[92] The character of the possession, whether as owner, tenant, etc. should be made to appear from the facts stated in the bill.[93]

(4) Wrongfulness of Defendant's Acts

The bill or complaint must unequivocally disclose facts and circumstances showing that the defendant has no right to perform the act or pursue the course of action of which the plaintiff complains.

tutes a public nuisance.[6] In an action by a city to restrain the violation of a zoning ordinance, no special damage or injury to the city need be alleged.[7] To authorize an injunction in a suit by the attorney general, acting for the state, to restrain a public service corporation from charging rates in excess of those fixed by statute, it is not necessary to aver a specific injury to the public, it being sufficient if the facts alleged are such as to show a public injury or mischief.[8]

In a suit for injunction, allegations of damage are not necessary in the sense that the amount which plaintiff should recover enters into the determination of the right to equitable relief; they are essential only in order that the court may determine that plaintiff's injuries are of such substance as to warrant the equitable intervention of the court.[9]

(b) Irreparable Injury

Generally the complaint must show that a refusal to grant the writ will result in irreparable injury to the plaintiff, but specific allegations of irreparable injury are not necessary if the averments as a whole show that this would be the result of the acts complained of.

Generally, unless the rule is changed by statute,[10] an injunction will not be granted unless the complaint shows that a refusal to grant the writ will work irreparable injury.[11] It is not sufficient simply to allege that the injury will be irreparable, but the facts must be stated so that the court may see that the apprehension of irreparable injury is well founded.[12] In view of the severity or harshness of the remedy by injunction, a strict adherence to this rule of pleading is required.[13] Nevertheless, it need not be alleged in terms that the damages would be irreparable if the averments of the complaint as a whole show that this would be the result of the acts complained of.[14] Where the facts alleged in the bill show that the acts complained of are of such a character that if persisted in irreparable injury will be done, the fact that the word "almost" is used in connection with the charge of irreparable damage will not vitiate the pleading.[15]

15. Md.—Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152

Trespass or other injury to real property. Generally an injunction against trespass, waste, or other injury to real property must allege facts showing irreparable injury,[16] and a mere conclusion or opinion that the damages will be irreparable, not substantiated by the facts, is insufficient.[17] The fact that plaintiff's title is undisputed does not relieve him from the necessity of showing that irreparable injury will be done by the threatened or apprehended acts of defendant.[18] If the injunction is sought against a continuing trespass, a showing of irreparable injury has been held to be unnecessary,[19] at least where the injunction is sought as an auxiliary remedy in an action for damages.[20] In a suit primarily to reform a lease, but seeking an injunction against trespass as incidental to relief, irreparable injury need not be alleged.[21]

Petition to restrain acts by public official. In accordance with the general rule, a petition to enjoin performance of certain acts by a public official must show that plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury,[22] and a mere general allegation to this effect is not sufficient.[23]

Suit by public official to restrain violation of law. Irreparable injury need not be alleged by a public official seeking to restrain the violation of an administrative order where the statute authorizes an injunction on a showing of violation of the order.[24]

Breach of contract or covenant. Generally a petition to restrain the violation of a contract must allege facts showing irreparable injury,[25] but this allegation has been held not to be necessary in a suit to enjoin the violation of a restrictive covenant[26] or in a suit to enjoin the violation of a contract for exclusive sales territory where the statute permits an injunction whenever there is no adequate remedy by an action for damages.[27]

(6) Inadequacy of Remedy at Law

Where the jurisdiction of equity depends on the lack of an adequate remedy at law the bill must state facts from which the court can determine that the remedy at law is inadequate.

Where the jurisdiction of equity depends on the lack of an adequate remedy at law, a bill for an injunction must state facts from which the court can determine that the remedy at law is inadequate.[28] The petition must show that no legal remedy exists or that all legal remedies have been exhausted,[29] unless the pursuit of the legal remedies would subject plaintiff to a multiplicity of suits and would therefore not constitute an adequate remedy at law.[30] A general allegation that plaintiff has no speedy or adequate remedy at law is a mere conclusion and of no effect.[31] However, where the facts stated in the bill show that the remedy at law is inadequate, it is not necessary to allege in terms that the remedy at law is inadequate.[32] Where the inadequacy of a remedy at law is not an essential factor to the granting of relief it need not be pleaded in the bill or complaint.[33]

(7) Defendant's Inability to Respond in Damages

If the fact that the injury inflicted will be irreparable or the fact that the remedy at law will be inadequate depends on whether the defendant is able to respond in damages, an allegation of his insolvency or inability to respond in damages is indispensable.

If the fact that the injury inflicted will be irreparable, or the fact that the remedy at law will be inadequate, depends on whether defendant is able to respond in damages, an allegation of his insolvency or inability to respond in damages is indispensable.[34] Unless dispensed with by statute, an allegation of insolvency is necessary if it appears that compensation in damages will afford an adequate remedy,[35] and it has been so held where the complaint shows that the damages are readily ascertainable,[36] or where it is alleged that the act complained of will result in damages in a designated sum.[37] In the absence of an averment of insolvency it generally will be assumed that defendant is solvent and able to respond in damages for any injuries inflicted.[38] Insolvency of defendant need not be alleged where it is not a material factor for equitable relief,[39] and it has been held that where the allegations are such as to show that the injury will be irreparable,[40] or that the damages will not be capable of estimation,[41] or that there is a determined purpose on the part of defendant to commit repeated injuries and thus render redress at law obtainable only by a multiplicity of suits[42] an averment that defendant is insolvent is unnecessary. So a complaint to restrain continuous trespasses need not allege defendant's insolvency,[43] at least where the title is undisputed.[44]

Sufficiency of pleading. Vague, conflicting, and uncertain averments of insolvency or financial irresponsibility are of no effect,[45] nor is it sufficient

32 C.J. p 329 note 26.

33. Injunction as auxiliary remedy
Where a statute permits an injunction against a continuance of the injury as an auxiliary remedy in an action for damages for the injury, the absence of a legal remedy need not be alleged.—Pisny v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 221 N.W. 205, 207 Iowa 515, modified on other grounds 222 N.W. 609, 207 Iowa 515.

Suit to restrain violation of administrative order
In a suit by a public official to restrain the violation of an administrative order under a statute authorizing an injunction on a showing of violation of the order, it is not necessary for complainant to negative the existence of an adequate remedy at law.—American Fruit Growers v. U. S., C.C.A.Cal., 105 F.2d 722—Brown v. Hecht Co., D.C.D.C., 49 F.Supp. 528, reversed on other grounds 137 F.2d 689, certiorari granted Hecht Co. v. Brown, 64 S.Ct. 81, and reversed on other grounds 64 S.Ct. 587.

A certificate of no adequate remedy at law, as required by the Act of Oct. 13, 1840, P.L. 1, § 11, 17 P.S. § 284, is neither necessary nor proper to a bill in equity, praying for injunctive relief.—Chatfield v. Washeim, Pa.Com.Pl., 29 North.Co. 275.

As showing inadequacy of legal remedy to allege that plaintiff believes defendant to be insolvent.[46] For the purpose of showing insolvency it has been held sufficient to allege that defendant's property is "beyond the reach of legal process,"[47] or that he has very little property not exempt from execution and is not responsible for the damages,[48] or that he "is in very slender circumstances, and is unable to pay and satisfy the recovery were he [the plaintiff] compelled to resort to" covenants contained in a deed made by defendant,[49] or that an execution against defendant has been returned nulla bona.[50] It has been held that, in the absence of a motion for a more specific allegation, an averment that defendant will not be able to respond for the damages for which he will be liable is sufficient, and that it is not necessary to aver that he is proof against an execution;[51] but it is not sufficient to allege that defendant has parted with "most" of his property, subject to levy and sale, except his residence[52] or that he has no visible property exempt from execution.[53] Where defendant is an officer who has given a bond with sureties, it is not sufficient to allege that he is insolvent in a suit to enjoin him from performing his official duties, but it must be alleged that his sureties are insolvent.[54] An allegation that all the defendants are insolvent except one admits the solvency of the latter.[55]

(8) Multiplicity of Suits

Plaintiff should state the facts showing how a multiplicity of suits would be required if injunctive relief were not granted rather than merely stating that a multiplicity of suits would be required.

Mere averments that a multiplicity of suits will be required in the absence of relief by injunction are not sufficient; the facts showing how a multiplicity of suits would be required should be stated,[56] and it should be alleged that all plaintiffs will be affected alike by the act sought to be enjoined.[57]

(9) Fraud

Where fraud is relied on as a ground for injunctive relief, the facts constituting the fraud must be set forth clearly and specifically.

A mere general allegation or conclusion of fraud relied on as a ground for injunctive relief is insufficient; the facts constituting the fraud must be set forth clearly and specifically.[58]

(10) Doing or Offering to Do Equity

In some jurisdictions the plaintiff must allege that he has done or is willing to do everything which is necessary to entitle him to the relief sought.

In some jurisdictions plaintiff must allege that he has done or is willing to do everything which is necessary to entitle him to the relief sought.[59] Perhaps the most familiar application of this principle occurs in cases of averment of tender, as where plaintiff admits a sum of money to be due or equitably due to defendant. In these circumstances the bill must show that plaintiff has paid or has offered to pay, or must contain an averment of plaintiff's willingness to pay, such sum of money to entitle him to relief by injunction;[60] but if the contract is void tender of money has been held not to be necessary.[61] An allegation that plaintiff "is still willing and now offers to pay whatever amount he may be justly chargeable with, if any, and in this respect submits himself to the order and decree of the court," is a sufficient offer to do equity, and plaintiff need not actually bring the money into court.[62] Where defendant refuses to receive what is justly due to him, on a tender being made of it, plaintiff need only repeat his offer in the bill and need not make a formal tender of the money.[63]

c. Prayer

Ordinarily an injunction will not be granted under a prayer for general relief; it must be expressly prayed, and the precise nature of the injunctive relief sought must be specified.

There is some authority that an injunction may be granted under a prayer for general equitable relief.[64] Ordinarily, however, an injunction will not be granted under a prayer for general relief; it must be expressly prayed.[65] This is true with respect to perpetual,[66] temporary,[67] and mandatory injunctions,[68] and to restraining orders.[69] The prayer must specify the precise nature of injunctive relief sought.[70] A prayer for permanent relief on a final hearing does not include relief by a temporary injunction,[71] but a prayer for either a

Prayer sufficient for temporary injunction
(1) A petition praying for the issuance of an injunction and in immediate connection praying that "upon final hearing hereof these temporary restraining order or a temporary injunction is amply specific to support the jurisdiction of the court to grant relief by preliminary injunction.[72] Where the injunctive relief asked is broader than that to which plaintiff is entitled under the allegations of the bill it has been held proper in some jurisdictions to refuse all injunctive relief,[73] but it has also been held that a complaint is not so defective as to bar any relief because complainant asks for more relief than the court might deem proper under the facts proved,[74] or because he has asked the wrong relief.[75] A prayer may be so general and indefinite as not to warrant any relief,[76] but the fact that a prayer for a temporary injunction is verbose and illogical will not vitiate it if other substantial requirements of a prayer are complied with.[77] A prayer for relief in the alternative is not objectionable,[78] although inconsistent relief cannot be prayed for.[79] Failure of the petition to ask for the fixing of bond for the issuance of the injunction is not fatal to the petition as the court may order the giving of the bond under prayer for general relief.[80]

Additional relief. A prayer for general relief in addition to a specific injunctive relief may support the granting of any relief which the court deems justified under the circumstances.[81] Damages may be allowed under a prayer for general relief,[82] unless the complaint is not framed in such a manner as to make that legal remedy available.[83] It is proper to ask at the same time for both an injunction and for damages.[84]

As ancillary relief. Relief by injunction may be sought as ancillary relief, but in such case if the right to the main relief falls the right to injunctive relief also falls.[85] Where the ultimate purpose of the action is not an injunction, but an accounting, a prayer for an injunction is not necessary.[86]

Prayer for process. As a general rule in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, an injunction bill should contain a prayer for process against defendant.[87] While there is some authority to the contrary,[88] it has very generally been held that the bill or complaint should contain a prayer for injunction in the prayer for process as well as in the prayer for relief,[89] and that if it does not it is demurrable.[90]

d. Construction of Bill or Complaint

A bill or complaint for injunctive relief is construed strictly against the pleader. The court will give a reasonable construction to the bill and will consider it in accordance with its general scope and tenor regardless of isolated averments.

A bill or complaint for injunctive relief will be construed strictly against the pleader,[91] and no pre-plaintiffs have judgment making said injunction perpetual" contained a sufficiently specific prayer for the issuance of a temporary injunction. —McCorkel v. District Trustees of Robinson Springs School Dist. No. 76 of Comanche County, Tex.Civ. App., 121 S.W.2d 1048.

sumptions will be indulged to support the pleading.[92] The court will look at the substance of the bill, and will disregard the name by which the pleader calls it;[93] it will give a reasonable construction to the bill[94] and will consider it in accordance with its general scope and tenor, regardless of isolated averments[95] or general allegations unsupported by the facts stated.[96] The bill will be construed with the exhibits filed with it.[97] If the statements of fact in the bill are contradictory they nullify each other and pertinent matters of common knowledge or public record may be resorted to in construing them.[98] Where the statement of facts constituting a cause or causes of action will support either of two actions, and it is doubtful which the pleader intended, the prayer for relief may be consulted for the purpose of ascertaining the pleader's intendment.[99]

e. Filing Exhibits

As a general rule, where the right to an injunction is based on a written instrument in plaintiff's possession, the instrument or a copy thereof should be filed with the bill.

As a general rule, where the right to an injunction is based on a written instrument in the possession of plaintiff or to which he has ready access, or such instrument materially supports plaintiff's claim, the instrument itself or a copy thereof should be filed with the bill to enable the court to construe it and determine whether plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed;[1] and if this is not done the bill may be subject to demurrer.[2] However, if what purports to be a full and exact copy of the document is filed with the bill, alleged omissions therein do not render the bill demurrable, the existence of such omissions being a question of fact which should be raised by answer and not by demurrer.[3] Where the right to an injunction is sufficiently supported by possession of the locus in quo, the bill need not attach documents evidencing complainant's right to occupy the premises as life tenant.[4] Failure to file exhibits is excusable where the writings are in the hands of plaintiff's adversary and cannot be produced.[5] Documents which are not the basis of plaintiff's claim, but are remote or collateral,[6] or which are merely evidence in support of allegations of ultimate facts,[7] need not be filed. Also a failure to file exhibits is not fatal where the bill incorporates or sets out all that the exhibits would show.[8]

The filing of title papers is considered supra subdivision b (3) of this section.

§ 183. —— Plea or Answer and Subsequent Pleadings

Defendant must set up in his answer every ground on which he intends to rely and he must meet fairly and fully all the properly pleaded allegations of the complaint.

Defendant must set up in his answer every ground on which he intends to rely,[9] and he must, by denial or avoidance or by showing a want of equity, meet fairly and fully the allegations of the bill or complaint,[10] other than those which are merely conjectural or argumentative.[11] Material allegations of a verified bill which are not denied are deemed to be true,[12] but this rule has no application to statements of the bill which are mere conclusions.[13] In accordance with the rules of practice in the particular jurisdiction a general denial may be sufficient to put in issue all the allegations of the complaint,[14] but, where a bill alleges on information and belief, a general denial of the allegations puts in issue only plaintiff's information and belief and not the truth or falsity of the facts alleged.[15]

Although the precision requisite in pleading in an action at law has been held to be unnecessary,[16] the averments of the answer should be positive, certain, unambiguous, and unequivocal,[17] and relevant and material to the subject matter of the controversy;[18] and they must not consist of mere conclusions.[19] Defendant may assert in the answer any rights arising out of the transaction which are necessarily involved in the complete determination of the controversy,[20] and, if he desires relief by injunction, he must ask for it in his pleadings.[21] The answer must be that of defendant and not his attorney,[22] and it must be based on defendant's knowledge and not merely on his belief.[23] The papers filed by defendant must be filed as an answer in order to be effective as such.[24]

A motion to dissolve, where it puts in issue the truth of the allegation of the complaint, may be ordered to stand as a part of the answer.[25] The court may in its discretion refuse to allow an injunction against any one of defendants on the answer of some of them, although others have failed to answer.[26]

Time for answer. Generally, the time to answer as of right is governed by the statutes or rules of practice prevailing in the forum where the action is brought,[27] but the court in its discretion may permit the answer to be filed after the expiration of the prescribed time if the circumstances warrant and plaintiff is not prejudiced thereby.[28]

Reply by plaintiff. Affirmative averments of a verified answer must be taken as true in the absence of a replication.[29] Where the answer raises the question as to whether the complaint is within the provisions of a particular statute and, therefore, must comply therewith, plaintiff may test the issue by pleading both as though it were within the statute and as though it were outside the statute.[30] A reply in which plaintiff seeks to deny averments in the answer and also to demur to the answer has been held to be defective.[31]

§ 184. —— Cross Bill

Defendant for the purpose of asserting equities which are connected with the subject matter of the original bill or complaint may file a cross bill or counterclaim against plaintiff or against codefendants, and, as a general rule, he must do so if he seeks affirmative relief.

Defendant, for the purpose of asserting equities which are connected with the subject matter of the original bill or complaint, may file a cross bill or, in some jurisdictions, a counterclaim in lieu of a cross bill, against plaintiff[32] or against codefendants,[33] even though plaintiff may be entitled to an injunction;[34] and, as a general rule, it is necessary for defendant to file a cross bill or counterclaim if he seeks affirmative relief.[35] To be maintainable the cross bill must be germane to the issues presented by the original bill or complaint,[36] and it must state facts which, if proved, will entitle defendant to the relief sought.[37] In some jurisdictions defendant may, by a cross action, set up a claim for damages against plaintiff for having sued out the injunction,[38] but in other jurisdictions he cannot do so.[39] The cross bill may be construed with the other pleadings in the case.[40] Defendant is not entitled to relief on a cross claim where his supplemental pleadings are inconsistent with a right thereto.[41]

§ 185. —— Demurrer and Motions

a. In general
b. Grounds
c. Requisites and sufficiency
d. Admissions
e. Hearing and determination

a. In General

As a general rule the sufficiency of a bill or complaint for an injunction may be tested by demurrer.

Generally, in the absence of a statute or rule of court to the contrary, the sufficiency of a bill or complaint for an injunction may be questioned or tested by demurrer.[43] The right to demur for want of jurisdiction of the subject matter is not waived by the submission of a party to the jurisdiction of the court over his person.[44] The court may properly allow a general demurrer to be presented at the hearing of an application for a temporary injunction.[45]

Motion to dissolve. Under some statutes it is permissible to attack the sufficiency of the bill by a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction in the same manner as by a general demurrer.[46]

Motion to make more definite and certain. While a bill or complaint containing a general allegation of injury to real estate by waste, without stating the particulars, is not demurrable for want of facts, a motion may be made to make the petition more definite and certain.[47]

b. Grounds

Generally, grounds for a demurrer exist where, through particular defects in pleading or omissions of essential allegations, the bill or complaint fails to set forth a good cause for equitable relief.

In accordance with the rule that the sufficiency of a bill or complaint for an injunction may be tested by demurrer, as stated supra subdivision a of this section, broadly stated a bill which on its face fails to set forth a good cause of action is demurrable,[48] and a bill which sets forth a good cause of action for the equitable relief prayed is not demurrable.[49] A complaint for an injunction is not

Suit to restrain action
In a suit to enjoin the prosecution of an action for damages in the courts of a sister state, the only question presented is defendant's right to sue in that forum, and defendant cannot by a cross bill litigate his right to recover damages.—Missouri-Kansas & T. R. Co. v. Wilkins, 256 P. 910, 125 Okl. 150.

Determination of boundary in trespass suit
In lessee's suit to enjoin trespass on leased glebe land, defendant's cross bill, alleging that lessee was acting for third person who had encroached on defendant's land and with whom defendant had had controversy concerning boundary line, and asking that boundary line be determined, was held proper, since issue raised by cross bill was germane to that presented by lessee's petition.—Brown v. demurrable if, on any state of proof which its allegations justify, the court could grant an injunction.[50] A special demurrer is properly overruled when the grounds on which it is urged are not supported by the actual facts of the case,[51] but, when the grounds on which the demurrer is urged are valid and are supported by the facts, it is error for the court to overrule the demurrer.[52] The impropriety of the bill for injunction as a means of obtaining the relief sought,[53] or want of equity appearing on the face of the bill,[54] may be a ground for demurrer, and, where the prayer and scope of a bill show that its chief purpose is to obtain an injunction, it has been held that it will be held bad on demurrer if it is insufficient for that purpose, although it may be sufficient to warrant other relief,[55] but these rules do not prevail, of course, if they are superseded by statutory provisions.[56] Particular defects for which a demurrer will lie, in the absence of a statute or rule of court otherwise providing, include multifariousness,[57] failure to state facts instead of conclusions,[58] failure to show irreparable injury,[59] failure to allege facts showing the inadequacy of a remedy at law,[60] such as by allegations of defendant's insolvency,[61] failure to present a concrete issue for decision,[62] and misjoinder or nonjoinder of necessary parties.[63] Defective allegations as to the right by which plaintiff sues should be reached by a motion to make more specific and not by demurrer,[64] but failure to show that a contract or covenant sought to be enforced was for the benefit of plaintiff has been held ground for demurrer.[65] Failure to serve with process one of the parties named as defendant in the petition is not a ground for demurrer.[66] A bill which is improperly verified or entirely lacks verification is not demurrable, because the demurrer admits the truth of the allegations.[67]

Where the question of laches can better be determined at the hearing on the merits, the court will refuse to dispose of the question on demurrer.[68]

A cross bill which on its face fails to set forth a good cause of action,[69] or which is not germane to the original bill or complaint,[70] is subject to demurrer. On the other hand, a cross bill which contains equity and which is germane to the issues presented by the original bill or complaint has been held not to be demurrable.[71]

71. Fla.—Osius v. Barton, supra.

Answer. A demurrer to an answer which seeks to set up an unavailable defense should be sustained.[72] Where an answer in an injunction suit contains a general denial pursuant to a statute allowing a defendant in injunction proceedings to answer as in other civil actions, a demurrer to the answer will be overruled.[73]

Absence of, or defects in, exhibits. Failure of complainant to attach a necessary exhibit to his bill is not a ground for demurrer but should be reached by motion.[74] Defects in an abstract of title attached to a petition to enjoin trespass for the purpose of showing what will be relied on at the trial and not to show title in plaintiff are not ground for demurrer,[75] but, if the abstract is incorporated in the petition to show title, failure of the abstract to show a good chain of title will render the petition subject to demurrer.[76] Where no abstract of title is required to be attached to the petition, a mere allegation of ownership is sufficient to withstand a demurrer on the ground that plaintiff's title is not shown.[77]

c. Requisites and Sufficiency

As a general rule a demurrer should specify the reasons why the pleading demurred to is insufficient.

As a general rule a demurrer should specify the reasons why the pleading demurred to is insufficient,[78] or point out clearly its defective features.[79] Thus a specific objection that plaintiff has failed to allege facts in support of conclusions,[80] that plaintiff has misnamed repeated breaches of a contract by calling them trespasses,[81] that a contract, in a suit to restrain its breach, is unenforceable in equity,[82] or that a bill for mandatory injunction against the county judge should have joined the other members of the fiscal court as defendants,[83] should be reached by a special demurrer, but a general demurrer has been held to be sufficient to raise the question as to the adequacy of plaintiff's legal remedy apparent from the face of the petition.[84] Where a complaint states several grounds, a demurrer may be addressed to each of them.[85] A motion to dismiss a bill for want of equity operates as a demurrer ore tenus.[86]

d. Admissions

A demurrer to an injunction bill admits the truth of all such matters of fact as are well and sufficiently pleaded.

In accordance with rules of equity pleading, as stated in Equity § 283, a demurrer to an injunction bill admits the truth of all such matters of fact as are well and sufficiently pleaded.[87] On the other hand, matters which are not well pleaded are not admitted by demurrer,[88] such as allegations which are mere conclusions of law;[89] and matters of law or fact which are repugnant to each other are not admitted.[90]

e. Hearing and Determination

In determining the sufficiency of the bill as against a demurrer, the court is limited to an inquiry as to whether the matters or facts disclosed by the bill present a case for relief and it cannot consider matters outside the bill. A demurrer is properly decided before a hearing on the merits, but the time for the decision has been held to rest within the discretion of the court.

In determining the sufficiency of a bill or complaint as against a demurrer, the court is limited to an inquiry as to whether the matters or facts disclosed by the bill present a case for relief,[91] and it cannot consider matters outside the bill,[92] such as the answer,[93] oral testimony,[94] or affidavits presented on a hearing for a preliminary injunction;[95] nor can it determine questions of relative convenience and injury.[96] The general rule that as against a general demurrer every reasonable intendment is indulged favorably to the petition is inapplicable to injunction applications.[97] The sustaining of a demurrer without a submission on the demurrer and without complainant's consent has been held to be error.[98]

Time for hearing. A demurrer to a bill is properly decided before a motion for an injunction is heard,[99] but whether or not a demurrer will be decided before a hearing on the merits has been held to rest within the discretion of the court.[1] When a demurrer to a bill for an injunction and a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction issued thereon are both pending, it is within the discretion of the trial court to determine which shall be heard first.[2] When authorized by statute the court may rule on a demurrer to a petition for an injunction at an interlocutory hearing,[3] but the mere statutory authorization does not require the court to do so;[4] the court may refuse to pass on a demurrer at an interlocutory hearing after the appearance term and it may consider the demurrer along with the pleadings and evidence.[5]

Under a constitutional provision permitting a judge at any time, in vacation, or at chambers, to hear and determine by interlocutory or final judgment any matter or issue where a jury verdict is not required, the judge, in vacation, may vacate prior orders overruling a demurrer.[6]

Rulings on demurrer. The sustaining of a demurrer to a complaint, is in effect a final decision that, as far as that pleading is concerned, plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction,[7] and, if no exception thereto is taken, the ruling becomes the law of the case,[8] but an order sustaining a general demurrer does not dispose of the rights of the petitioner on an amended petition.[9] Where a demurrer to a petition is sustained, the answer of defendant falls with the petition.[10] A demurrer to an amended bill may be sustained, although defendant had filed an answer to the original bill.[11] Where an amended bill is served after sustaining a demurrer to the original, the original being completely superseded, an injunction pendente lite cannot be granted on a motion made on the original bill.[12] In a proper case a demurrer to a complaint for a permanent injunction may be sustained without prejudice to the preliminary restraining order or temporary injunction already granted.[13] Unless the case has been submitted for final decree, the court in its order overruling the demurrer cannot grant a permanent injunction without giving defendant an opportunity to answer.[14] A ruling that the petition is not demurrable on any ground stated is not a ruling that plaintiff is entitled to the injunction.[15] Where the temporary restraining order has by its terms expired at the time of the hearing, an order in the ruling on the demurrer cannot have the effect of dissolving the restraining order.[16]

§ 186. —— Amended and Supplemental Pleadings

a. In general
b. Leave of court
c. Time to amend
d. Procedure
e. Operation and effect
f. Supplemental pleadings

a. In General

Unless otherwise provided by statute or rule of court, the pleadings in a suit for an injunction may be amended under the rules pertaining to the amendments of pleadings generally.

In the absence of a statute or rule of court to the contrary, the pleadings in a suit for an injunction may be amended under the rules pertaining to the amendments of pleadings generally.[17] The pleadings may be amended to correct a formal defect or mistake,[18] or to add necessary allegations,[19] or, as stated supra § 177, to cure a defect of parties. It is permissible to amend a bill or complaint defective by reason of stating conclusions of law,[20] or for a failure sufficiently to describe the locus in quo,[21] or for want of an averment of the amount in controversy if it does not affirmatively appear that the court is without jurisdiction,[22] or for want of an averment of insolvency;[23] and it may also be amended to change the statement of the capacity in which plaintiff brings the suit,[24] or to correct the statement of damages.[25] Acts done pendente lite,[26] or information received since the start of the suit,[27] may be brought into the suit by amendment. Where the bill is defective for want of a prayer for injunction,[28] or for defects in the prayer,[29] an amendment to cure the defect may be allowed, and an amendment asking additional relief which is germane to the cause of action may also be allowed.[30] The court may grant relief warranted by the state of facts existing at the time of the entry of the decree, including facts which did not exist at the time the bill was filed, without requiring an amendment if the prayers of the bill

Amendment to prayer for general relief
An amendment to petition to enjoin trespass, seeking recovery of land included within boundary fence, was held not to add new cause of action where the original prayer asked for general relief.—Sanders v. Jones, 142 S.E. 680, 166 Ga. 186.

are broad enough to cover such relief.[31] An amendment to the answer may be allowed to conform to the proofs.[32]

No amendment should be allowed unless the interests of justice manifestly require it.[33] When permitted by statute the court may, before trial, allow an amendment which states a new cause of action if it is germane to the controversy before the court;[34] but, in the absence of statute, the court will not permit an amendment which changes the essential nature of the action,[35] although plaintiff has discovered from the evidence for the defense that such a new cause of action exists;[36] and, where there is no cause of action for injunctive relief at the commencement of the suit, an amendment to include a cause of action subsequently accruing is properly denied.[37] An amendment which is insufficient to cure defects or to warrant relief,[38] which merely amplifies the cause of action set out in the original petition without alleging any additional facts in addition to those already contained in the petition,[39] which is sought for the manifest purpose of delay,[40] which concerns a person not a party to the suit,[41] or which shows on its face that it was filed before the happening of the event therein alleged as a fact,[42] should be refused. Likewise, it is proper for the court to refuse to allow an amendment which contradicts facts which plaintiff has sworn to in the original bill to be positively true, unless he can clearly show that the statements in the original bill were made by mistake,[43] or an amendment, the effect of which will be to relieve plaintiff from the rules and practice of a court of equity, and to deprive defendants of the advantages of their proper position as respondents to a bill in equity before a decree.[44]

In the case of verified bills the right of amendment is granted with greater caution than in case of unverified bills.[45] A verified bill for an injunction cannot be amended by striking out any of its allegations.[46] It may, however, be corrected by the addition of explanatory or supplemental statements.[47]

Reamendment of bill. The court, on an application to allow a reamendment of a bill, will act with great circumspection.[48] It has been held that, where a second amendment is desired, plaintiff must accompany his application with an affidavit that he "had not a knowledge of the facts, so as to enable him to bring . . . [his] case upon the record sooner."[49]

Amendments of demurrers may be permitted in the discretion of the court.[50]

Additional answer by defendant. Where the bill is materially amended after defendant has put in his answer, he is entitled to put in a further answer.[51]

Reply. Plaintiff may be permitted to amend his reply.[52]

b. Leave of Court

As a general rule leave of court is necessary for an amendment and the matter is within the discretion of the court.

As a general rule after the bill has been filed, it cannot be amended without leave of court,[53] and a motion for an injunction based on an amendment made without leave will ordinarily be dismissed,[54] although it has been held that, where an amended bill is filed without leave, the chancellor's refusal to strike it out is equivalent to leave to file it and cures the irregularity of filing it without leave.[55] The allowance or refusal of permission to amend is within the discretion of the court.[56]

c. Time to Amend

As a general rule an amendment may be made at any time within the discretion of the court subject to the limitation that the rights of the opposite party must not be prejudiced thereby.

An amendment may be made, in the absence of a rule of court to the contrary, at any time within the discretion of the court,[57] subject to the limitation that the rights of the opposite party must not be prejudiced thereby.[58] Amendments are usually allowed before an answer is filed;[59] but they may be allowed after the answer is filed and before the hearing,[60] after a temporary injunction has been granted and before the final trial or hearing,[61] or after the dissolution of a temporary injunction and before the final hearing,[62] at the close of the evidence,[63] or even after the final hearing and before the final decree.[64] The court, in its discretion, may refuse to allow an amendment at the time requested.[65] After the cause is at issue,[66] or after the injunction has been refused,[67] leave to file an amendment pertaining to matters known by applicant at an earlier stage of the proceedings is properly refused.

After death of plaintiff and revival. Even after the death of plaintiff and the revival of the suit in the names of his personal representatives, it is permissible to amend the bill by setting up matters which are not inconsistent with, but are merely an addition to, what is already set out in the bill.[68]

d. Procedure

To authorize the allowance of an amendment the causes necessitating the amendment should be stated and sworn to and at least the substance of the amendment should be set forth.

To authorize the allowance of an amendment, the causes necessitating the amendment should be stated and sworn to,[69] and at least the substance of the amendment should be set forth.[70] Where the evidence before the court is sufficient to support the amendment and no further relief is asked, it has been held to be unnecessary that the proposed amendment be first submitted to the court in writing verified by affidavit showing why it had not been filed sooner.[71] The amendment, when short,

may be interlined; but if it is of considerable length, it should be on a separate sheet of paper and annexed to the bill.[72]

A stipulation of the parties and an order to amend the pleadings may be treated as an amendment to the pleadings as respects the court's jurisdiction.[73]

Notice to adversary. Notice to the opposite party has been held to be necessary.[74]

Opposing affidavit by defendant. An affidavit by defendant denying the truth of the matters contained in the proposed amendment will not avail him, and the amendment will be allowed notwithstanding such affidavit.[75]

e. Operation and Effect

As a general rule an amendment of a bill relates back to the time at which the bill was filed. Generally an amendment of a bill after a temporary injunction has been granted does not operate to dissolve or vacate the injunction as of course, but there is some authority that it does so unless the injunction is expressly saved in the order for amendment.

As a general rule, an amendment of a bill relates back to the time at which the bill was filed.[76] If the amendments do not change the aspect of the bill, a new motion for injunction will be denied.[77] If the court had no jurisdiction of the bill as filed, any amendment is a nullity.[78]

On injunction previously granted. Generally, the amendment of a bill after a temporary injunction has been granted does not operate to dissolve or vacate the injunction as of course,[79] although the order granting leave to amend is silent on the subject,[80] but there is some authority that the injunction is thereby dissolved unless an order is obtained that the amendment shall be without prejudice to the injunction.[81] An amendment which merely enlarges and strengthens the allegations of the bill without changing the character of the case does not affect the force of the injunction.[82]

It has been held that a preliminary injunction which is a nullity for having been issued under a petition so defective as not to state a cause of action cannot be made valid by the subsequent filing of an amendment,[83] but other decisions hold that the amended bill may be looked to, to support a preliminary injunction already issued, where the end sought to be attained by both bills is practically the same,[84] and, if the amended bill shows good ground for the injunction, it will not be dissolved on the sole ground that the original bill may have been defective.[85]

Amendment as furnishing grounds for dissolution is considered infra § 243.

f. Supplemental Pleadings

As a general rule a supplemental bill or a supplemental answer pertaining to matters germane to the original pleadings may be filed on leave of court.

As a general rule plaintiff may, on leave of court, file a supplemental bill, adding new charges based on facts which have occurred since the original bill was filed and on facts existing at that time which were then not known to him,[86] but in some jurisdictions a supplemental bill is not held to be necessary and an amendment may accomplish the object.[87] A supplemental bill should contain no matters which are not germane to the case made by the original bill,[88] and the new matter introduced thereby must not be such as to change the rights and interests of the parties before the court.[89] The court will not permit a supplemental bill to be filed when the bill shows that the act which the original bill sought to prevent had been done.[90] Permission to file a supplemental bill will be refused where the original or amended bill is wholly without equity,[91] or is wholly defective,[92] although, if the original bill is sufficient for one kind of relief, and facts afterward occur which entitle complainant to other and more extensive relief, he may have such relief by setting out the new matter in a supplemental bill.[93] Matters previously within plaintiff's knowledge will not be allowed to be incorporated in a supplemental bill where there is no sufficient excuse given by plaintiff for his failure to bring forward such matters in his original bill.[94]

A new injunction may be awarded on new facts incorporated in a supplemental bill, even though an injunction previously issued has been dissolved.[95]

Where subsequent events affect the right of plaintiff to equitable relief, a supplemental answer should be allowed.[96] The court in its discretion may properly refuse to permit defendant to add a counterclaim to his answer after the filing by the court of its findings and rulings.[97]

Leave of court. When plaintiff desires to file a supplemental bill he must obtain leave of court,[98] and the application should advise the court of the ground on which the relief sought by the supplemental bill is applied for.[99]

Effect on injunction already granted. The filing of a supplemental bill does not put an end to an injunction which has been previously issued on the original bill.[1]

§ 187. —— Verification

a. In general
b. Who may verify
c. Requisites and sufficiency
d. Amendment and waiver of defects

a. In General

A verified bill is, as a rule, essential to the granting of a preliminary injunction or restraining order. An answer seeking to dissolve an injunction before final hearing ordinarily must be verified.

As a general rule, where a preliminary injunction or a restraining order is asked, the bill or complaint must be verified,[2] but, in the absence of a strict mandatory requirement by statute or rule of court, it has been held that failure to verify does not as a matter of law require dismissal of the bill if affidavits or other satisfactory proof showing the necessity for the injunction is submitted or produced.[3] A statutory requirement that an application for injunction shall be verified is not dispensed with by another statutory provision which authorizes such temporary orders in divorce proceedings as are deemed necessary and equitable.[4] No verification is necessary in suits instituted by public officials to abate a nuisance or to restrain a violation of law where the statute permits the suit to be instituted on information only,[5] or where the statute expressly dispenses with the necessity for verification.[6] A motion for a preliminary injunction, if separate from the bill or complaint, need not be verified.[7] The fact that the bill or complaint waives answer under oath does not deprive defendant of the right to answer under oath.[8]

leging new facts[10] should be verified in the same manner and to the same extent as the bill itself, although an amendment need not be sworn to where no relief by way of injunction is prayed in the amendment and the injunction does not require for its support the additional matter brought out by the amendment.[11]

Where only perpetual injunction asked. Verification is not necessary where only a perpetual injunction is demanded.[12]

Answer. Under statutes in some jurisdictions, an answer containing a general denial puts plaintiff on proof of his case in order to procure a perpetual injunction, although the answer is not verified,[13] but verification of the answer is necessary on motion to dissolve the injunction before final hearing if the petition is sufficient to state a cause for injunctive relief.[14] Where an unverified answer and motion to dissolve are combined in one proceeding, the pleading may be treated as a demurrer.[15] The answer of a corporation under its seal must be accompanied by affidavits.[16]

b. Who May Verify

As a general rule the affidavit verifying the complaint should be made by plaintiff, but it may be made by plaintiff's attorney or agent, or by any person having personal knowledge of the facts contained in the complaint.

As a general rule the affidavit verifying the complaint should be made by plaintiff,[17] but it may also be made by any person having personal knowledge of the facts contained in the complaint,[18] although it has been held that an affidavit made by a person not apparently connected with the suit is practically no affidavit.[19] It must appear from the verification that the person verifying the bill knows the contents thereof; otherwise the verification is fatally defective.[20] The affidavit may be made by plaintiff's attorney or agent,[21] but, if it is so made, the attorney or agent must be described as such therein, or the affidavit will be fatally defective.[22] An affidavit by an agent must give reasons why it was not made by plaintiff.[23] If there are several plaintiffs the affidavit may be made by any one of them who is cognizant of the facts,[24] particularly under statutes which expressly so provide,[25] but an affidavit by one has been held to be insufficient if each of the plaintiffs represents separate and distinct interests and there is no showing in the petition or affidavit that affiant is acting as the agent for the others.[26]

c. Requisites and Sufficiency

No particular form of verification is required unless so prescribed by statute, but the verification must be definite, direct, and positive and it must extend to all the material facts on which the right to an injunction rests.

in doubt what facts affiant swears to.[29] The verification must be definite, direct, and positive,[30] and as a general rule not merely on information and belief,[31] or from hearsay,[32] but it has been held to be sufficient when affiant avers that he has information as a basis for his belief.[33] The verification must be of such a character as to render affiant liable for perjury if the facts sworn to are untrue.[34] Where plaintiff does not personally know the facts constituting his right to equitable relief he should swear that the facts stated as within his knowledge are true, and that those which he alleges are not stated within his knowledge he believes to be true;[35] he should give the source of his information and the grounds of his belief,[36] and he should annex to the bill affidavits of those from whom his information is derived.[37] Also, if some of the facts are sworn to on personal knowledge and some on information and belief, it should clearly appear from the affidavit itself what allegations are sworn to on personal knowledge and what allegations are sworn to on information and belief.[38] If this requirement is satisfied and the facts stated on knowledge are sufficient to authorize the allowance of an injunction, it is not material that other facts are stated on information and belief.[39] The fact that some of the facts are sworn to on information and belief will not of itself vitiate the pleading if such facts are not material to the issuance of the injunction.[40] If the facts are alleged directly and positively, a further statement that affiant believes them to be true will be treated as surplusage and the bill sustained.[41]

The fact that the affidavit to the bill is not attached thereto but is filed separately has been held not to be a reason for dismissal under preliminary objections.[42]

An unverified petition may be verified on the day of the hearing.[43]

Before whom sworn. An affidavit which is intended to be made the basis of an application for injunction should not be sworn to before plaintiff's attorney.[44] If the officer before whom verification must be made is designated by statute, the verification before any other officer than the one so designated is insufficient.[45]

Signature and jurat. Verification is sufficient when the petition for injunction is signed by petitioner and the jurat of the officer shows that it was sworn to and subscribed before him.[46]

d. Amendment and Waiver of Defects

The verification may be amended to correct defects, and the amendment may be allowed at the hearing or at the time of allowance of the injunction. Defects in the verification are waived by the failure to make formal and timely objections.

When the verification is defective, it may be amended.[47] It has been held that the amendment may be allowed at the hearing,[48] or at the time of allowance of the temporary injunction.[49] Defects in the verification are waived by the failure to make formal and timely objections.[50] Any deficiencies in the verification of a bill for injunction which might prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction are immaterial, where they are supplied by defendant in affidavits presented in opposition to the motion for temporary injunction.[51]

§ 188. —— Issues, Proof, and Variance

The issues properly determinable by the court are those presented by the pleadings, and the proof must correspond with the pleadings. Plaintiff must prove all the essential allegations of his bill which are not admitted and in like manner defendant must prove all the defenses on which he relies which are not admitted.

The issues properly determinable by the court are those presented by the pleadings,[52] and issues which are outside the scope of the case as presented by the pleadings are not before the court for determination.[53] In accordance with the general rules of equity pleading discussed in Equity §§ 444, 445, the proof must correspond with the pleadings,[54] and evidence not tending to support allegations in the pleadings should be rejected on the ground of variance,[55] but mere immaterial variances between pleading and proof are not fatal.[56] Plaintiff must prove all the essential allegations of his bill which are not admitted;[57] and it has been held that the operation of this rule is not affected by the court's intimation that a complete case has been made out, which intimation causes plaintiff to refrain from offering further evidence.[58] Similarly, defendant must prove all the defenses on which he relies which are not admitted.[59] Immaterial, surplus, or incidental allegations,[60] or allegations which are admitted by the opposing party,[61] need not be proved. In a suit by a public official to restrain a violation of law under a special statute granting that right, an equitable basis for the proceeding need not be proved, but the equitable remedy provided by the statute is to be exercised in accordance with established equitable procedure.[62]

§ 189. Evidence in General

Basing an injunction in part on proofs taken in open court may satisfy a statute prohibiting the issuance of an injunction except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court.

A statute prohibiting the issuance of an injunction in a case involving or growing out of a labor dispute except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court may be satisfied if the injunction is based in part on proofs taken in open court[63] or at least it may be so satisfied in a particular case where the oral proofs relate to disputed matters and affidavits are relied on only in respect of undisputed facts.[64] It is improper to issue a permanent injunction on defendant's default where there is no evidence in the record other than affidavits to support plaintiff's demand, a general statute requires proof of plaintiff's demand in all cases, and another statute authorizing proof by affidavit applies only to the issuance of a preliminary injunction.[65] The use of affidavits as evidence is considered infra § 195.

§ 190. —— Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof

a. Presumptions

Various presumptions may be indulged in a suit for an injunction; but a particular presumption will not be indulged where the proof, or lack of proof, renders it inapplicable or inappropriate.

General rules as to evidentiary presumptions in civil actions, as discussed in Evidence §§ 114–157, are applicable in proceedings for an injunction.[66] Thus it will be presumed that all facts which are not fully and candidly disclosed by the party seeking an injunction are detrimental to him,[67] or that defendant intends to continue to perform acts being done under permission,[68] or that he intends to perform acts commanded by his superiors.[69] Where complainant is not in actual possession he must show legal title to raise presumption of possession.[70] It has been held that a limitation on the use of property cannot be predicated on a mere inference.[71]

b. Burden of Proof

In a suit for injunctive relief, the plaintiff or complainant has the burden, in so far as the facts are controverted, of establishing his right to such relief, and the defendant has the burden of proving matters of defense.

In actions for injunctive relief the burden of proof is, as a rule, on complainant[72] to establish his right to injunctive relief[73] or where controvert-

The rules as to the admissibility of evidence in other equitable proceedings are applicable in actions for injunctions although it has been said that they are less strictly applied in an application for a preliminary injunction.

With regard to the admissibility of evidence, injunction proceedings are in general governed by the same rules that are applicable to other equitable proceedings.[98] Thus the rule that any otherwise competent evidence which is relevant and material is admissible and that evidence which is irrelevant, immaterial, or directed to collateral issues will be excluded has been applied in proceedings for injunctions as to actions and other legal proceedings;[99] injunctions with relation to property, conveyances, and encumbrances,[1] such, for example, as the pre-

or occupation;[17] injunctions in labor disputes,[18] such as injunctions against strikes,[19] or boycotts,[20] or against the disclosure or use of trade secrets;[21] or injunctions against criminal acts and conspiracies.[22]

Evidence is admissible in plaintiff's behalf to show his title or right,[23] and the absence of right of defendant to do the acts complained of,[24] and defendant may introduce evidence to controvert plaintiff's title[25] or establish his own right or title.[26]

Complainant is entitled to show the nature and extent of the threatened injury,[27] and that the acts complained of will be continued;[28] and defendant may controvert such evidence.[29]

Plaintiff may show the manner in which the evil may be remedied,[30] but defendant is not entitled to show that by the taking of measures not required of plaintiff the damages may be prevented.[31]

Matters occurring after the filing of a petition for an injunction and before trial on the merits may be heard by the court in the exercise of its discretion.[32]

Secondary evidence is inadmissible where the best evidence may be procured,[33] although the sufficiency of the foundation for the admission of secondary evidence is largely discretionary with the trial judge.[34]

The record of a prior suit wherein, on the same facts, an injunction was denied is admissible to resist a second application.[35]

Evidence for preliminary, compared with that for final, injunction. On the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction the rules of evidence are less strictly applied than on a final hearing, and evidence may be admissible which would not be competent in support of an application for a permanent injunction,[36] the object of this rule being to enable the court to exercise a sound discretion in granting or refusing an injunction.[37]

On bill and cross bill for injunction, it is correct practice to consider on the cross bill the evidence taken on the bill.[38]

a. In general
b. Preliminary injunctions

a. In General

In order to authorize the issuance of an injunction, every essential material fact must be established to a reasonable certainty, or at least a reasonable probability, by clear, convincing, and satisfactory evidence.

While, as will be noted, there are various statements in the cases as to the proof requisite in injunction proceedings, summed up in substance they are that every material fact essential to authorize the issuance of an injunction must be established to a reasonable certainty, or at least a reasonable probability, by clear, convincing and satisfactory evidence, and that an injunction should be denied where the evidence is such as to leave in doubt the existence of any fact necessary to authorize its issuance.[39] It has been variously stated in the decisions that, in order to authorize the issuance of an injunction, the right thereto must be established with certainty;[40] that the evidence must be clear,[41] clear and conclusive,[42] clear and convincing,[43] clear and satisfactory,[44] satisfactory,[45] or clear, satisfactory, and convincing;[46] that the right must be supported by the clearest proof;[47] that a clear and unexceptional right to an injunction must be shown;[48] that plaintiff will be held to strict proof;[49] that the evidence must convince the chancellor that an action for damages would be inadequate;[50] that an alleged mutual mistake must be proved by precise, clear, and indubitable evidence;[51] and that the proved facts must indisputably sustain the allegations.[52]

In any case, the facts necessary for granting relief by injunction must be established at least by a preponderance of the evidence,[53] which must be

Abundant evidence

To justify an injunction absolutely prohibiting certain acts, there should be abundant evidence that continuance of the acts will inevitably produce irreparable injury.—Thompson v. Kraft Cheese Co. of California, 291 P. 204, 210 Cal. 171.

Substantial evidence

(1) An injunction will be refused where there is no substantial evidence of a requisite fact.—Culinary Workers and Bartenders Local Union No. 631 A. F. of L. v. Busy Bee Cafe, 115 P.2d 246, 57 Ariz. 514.

competent and credible;[54] and what constitutes a preponderance of evidence is a question for the court trying the case, taking into consideration all the circumstances.[55] An injunction should be denied where the evidence is such as to leave it in doubt whether an injunction should be granted.[56] A jurisdictional fact necessary to the allowance of an injunction must be established prima facie before the court may proceed further.[57]

Direct or circumstantial evidence. While it has been said that, in order to justify the granting of an injunction, the evidence must be direct and positive, and not merely on information and belief,[58] either direct or circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to authorize the granting of an injunction.[59]

Hearsay evidence alone may be insufficient to establish a fact in an injunction suit,[60] but, when no objection is made thereto, it is, like any other evidence, to be considered and given the importance it deserves.[61]

Particular evidence held insufficient. Likewise, in accordance with the general principles stated at the opening of this section, the evidence in particular cases has been held to warrant the refusal of an injunction or insufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction or to establish particular facts or support particular findings in actions for injunctions as to actions and other legal proceedings;[62] injunctions with relation to property, conveyances, and encumbrances,[63] such, for example, as the prevention of trespasses,[64] requiring the removal of encroachments,[65] or preventing the cutting of timber;[66] injunctions as to contracts,[67] as, for example, covenants and restrictions with reference to the use of real property,[68] contracts as to the sale against the disclosure or use of trade secrets;[27] or injunctions against criminal acts and conspiracies.[28] Likewise the evidence has been held sufficient to show such particular facts as authority to sue,[29] plaintiff's title,[30] waiver of restrictive covenants,[31] change in character and environment of property,[32] special damage to plaintiff,[33] the likelihood of irreparable injury,[34] or the existence of a labor dispute.[35]

b. Preliminary Injunctions

To warrant issuance of a preliminary injunction, at least a prima facie case should be made out; but it is not necessary that a case be made out that would entitle complainant to relief at all events on the final hearing.

On an application for a preliminary injunction, it is not necessary that a case should be made out that would entitle complainant to relief at all events on the final hearing.[36] A preliminary injunction may issue to maintain the status quo where complainant has made out a prima facie case,[37] or where from the pleadings and the evidence it appears to the court that a case is presented proper for its investigation on a final hearing,[38] and there is no appart[46] the preliminary injunctive relief sought; but this rule has reference only to a conflict in the evidence on the material issues in the case.[47] The discretion of the court where the evidence is conflicting is discussed supra § 14.

§ 193. Pleadings and Affidavits as Evidence

Verified pleadings may be regarded as evidence on an application for a preliminary injunction.

Where the pleadings are properly verified, they may serve the office both of pleadings and evidence on an application for a temporary injunction.[48]

§ 194. —— Bill or Complaint

In many, although not all, jurisdictions a verified bill or complaint may, if not denied, support the issuance of a temporary injunction without any further evidence.

Except on a final hearing for a perpetual injunction[49] the bill or complaint itself, when properly verified, may be used as an affidavit as to the facts properly stated therein,[50] and in many,[51] but not all,[52] jurisdictions the bill alone, when so verified, may be a sufficient basis for the issuance of a temporary injunction. Where the practice is followed of accepting a verified complaint as part of complainant's evidence, the pleading takes the place of an affidavit and should be treated as such,[53] and the well pleaded allegations of the bill, to the extent that they have not been denied, are accepted as true for the purpose of deciding the application for temporary injunction.[54] In such cases the grant or denial of injunctive relief will be predicated on the sufficiency of the bill to state adequate grounds therefor.[55] The facts stated

In New York
(1) Early decisions were to the effect that the practice was not to issue an injunction on a verified complaint alone, but to require supporting affidavits.—Chatterton v. Kreitler, 2 Abb.N.Cas. 453—32 C.J. p 352 note 93 [a] (1).

(2) It was also held that an ordinary affidavit of verification was not sufficient evidence to establish as a fact the positive allegations in the complaint.—Bostwick v. Elton, 25 How.Pr. 362.

(3) But independent affidavits were not necessary, it being sufficient to attach an affidavit to the bill or complaint, and thus make it answer a double purpose.—Fowler v. Burns, 20 N.Y.Super. 637—Roome v. Webb, 3 How.Pr. 327, 1 Code Rep. 114.

(4) Under later practice it was held that an "affidavit," as the word was used in code provisions relative to issuance of injunctions, included a verified complaint.—Clark v. Herbert Booth King & Bro. Pub. Co., 57 N.Y.S. 975, 40 App.Div. 405.

(5) In any event, where a complaint is thus used, its evidential force should be tested by the same rules as are applied to other affidavits, and only such allegations as are sworn to positively, or, if stated on information and belief, where the source of the information and the ground of the belief are given, may be accepted as true.—Clark v. Herbert Booth King & Bro. Pub. Co., supra—32 C.J. p 352 note 93 [a] (2).

in a bill or complaint treated as an affidavit must stand the test to which oral testimony would be subjected,[56] averments which are only conclusions of law are not competent testimony even though they might stand as pure matter of pleading,[57] and unless a statement in the nature of a conclusion is supported by the facts or circumstances on which it rests it is insufficient to sustain an application for injunction.[58] Defects in a bill which fails to state facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of an injunction cannot be supplied by affidavits, as discussed supra § 182.

An unverified or insufficiently verified bill or petition, standing alone, is not sufficient evidence to authorize an interlocutory or temporary injunction,[59] and the allegations and their verification must be direct and positive.[60]

§ 195. —— Affidavits

a. In general
b. Requisites and sufficiency
c. By whom affidavit made
d. Notice, and service of affidavits
e. Affidavits in rebuttal

a. In General

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, and except on the hearing for a permanent injunction, affidavits may be considered, and where they establish sufficient grounds for a temporary injunction may justify its issuance; the court, however, may require or consider other evidence.

Except on final hearing,[61] it generally is held proper for complainant to support his case by affidavits, either before or after the answer, and either in support of his bill or in contradiction of the answer,[62] it being proper for the court to consider affidavits on both sides.[63] In the absence of statute providing otherwise[64] complainant may introduce other proper evidence if he sees fit;[65] and the court in its discretion may require or accept proofs other than affidavits and issue an injunction on the basis of such other proofs.[66] If it appears that the facts are evidenced by documents, a mere affidavit of those facts is not sufficient without accounting for the absence of the better form of evidence.[67] Affidavits may be refused where no sufficient reason is shown for delay in presenting them.[68]

To justify the issuance of a preliminary injunction on the basis of affidavits it must appear therefrom that sufficient grounds exist for its issuance;[69] and, where sufficient grounds are shown, the bill and affidavits alone may support issuance of a temporary or preliminary injunction.[70] There is, however, authority condemning affidavits as an untrustworthy source of evidence in injunction cases, and stating that the practice of granting injunctions on the basis of affidavits should be discouraged,[71] and that in all important matters the presence of the chief witnesses should be required at the hearing for the purpose of oral questioning.[72] The court will not, however, issue even a preliminary injunction on the basis of ex parte affidavits unless the right thereto clearly appears,[73] or unless necessary to prevent threatened irreparable damage,[74] and where the bill and answer present debatable questions the court in its discretion may refuse to grant a preliminary injunction on affidavits.[75]

(3) Entitling affidavits

(1) In General

Affidavits supporting an application for injunction should be based on the bill, disclose all known and material facts, and avoid allegations of mere conclusions.

The subject matter of an affidavit should be such as is admissible under general principles governing the admissibility of evidence.[76] An affidavit should be founded solely on the allegations of the bill,[77] and cannot, as shown supra § 182, enlarge or sup-

In New Jersey recent statutory provisions prohibiting the issuance of a temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court do not ban the use of affidavits, and are satisfied if the injunction is based in part on proofs taken in open court.—Isolantite, Inc., v. United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America, 22 A.2d 796, 130 N.J.Eq. 506, modified on other grounds Isolantite, Inc. v. United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, C. I. O., 29 A.2d 183, 132 N.J.Eq. 613.

In New York

(1) Under statutory provisions to the effect that hearings as to injunctions concerning labor disputes shall consist of the taking of testimony in open court with opportunity for cross-examination and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered, and that no affidavits shall be received in support of any of the allegations of the complaint, the temporary right to enjoin peaceful picketing by a labor union may not be established by affidavit.—Strauss v. Steiner, 18 N.Y.S.2d 395, 173 Misc. 521, affirmed 18 N.Y.S.2d 75, 259 App.Div. 725, appeal denied 19 N.Y.S.2d 771, 259 App. Div. 818—Abeles v. (2) Where no labor dispute is involved within the meaning of such statutory provisions they are inapplicable, but an injunction against picketing may be refused where the affidavits submitted fail to show the illegality of the act.—Anora Amusement Corporation v. Doe, 12 N.Y.S.2d 400, 171 Misc. 279.

Substantial doubt

Preliminary injunction should not be awarded on ex parte affidavits, unless in clear case, and should be refused if there is any substantial doubt as to right thereto.—U. S. v. Weirton Steel Co., D.C.Del., 7 F. Supp. 255.

Stereotyped form

Where affidavits annexed to a bill of complaint praying for an injunction were in stereotyped form, the affidavits lacked that probative force which, in a suit for injunction, is of first importance, and injunction would be denied.—Majestic Laundry Co. v. plement plaintiff's claims or supply defects in the bill. All facts within the knowledge of the applicant and material to the application should be disclosed,[78] although it is not essential that the affidavits should of themselves make out a sufficient case for injunction; they may be supplemented by documentary and record evidence.[79] Mere statements of conclusions are not sufficient,[80] but it is necessary that the facts relied on as showing grounds for injunction should be stated,[81] although the fact that some affidavits fail to satisfy this requirement will not render erroneous the granting of an injunction if there is ample other evidence on which to base the order.[82]

An affidavit of a third person that what he has stated in the complaint is true, when no complaint has been filed by him, is not sufficient.[83]

(2) Verification; Information and Belief

The verification of an affidavit, whether incorporated in the plaintiff's initial pleading or a distinct instrument, should be positive and direct; verification on information and belief ordinarily is insufficient, except under exceptional circumstances, as where positive knowledge is unattainable.

The verification of an affidavit in support of an application for injunctive relief must be direct[84] and positive.[85] The general rule is that affidavits, whether incorporated in plaintiff's initial pleading or employed as distinct and supporting papers, are insufficient to sustain issuance of an injunction if the averments are verified merely on the information and belief of affiant,[86] and that if any material averment is stated on information and belief there must also be attached the affidavit of the person from whom such information was obtained;[87] but statements on information and belief may be sufficient in exceptional cases, as where positive knowledge is not attainable and the danger of injury is immediate,[88] and it has been held that after a rule to show cause has been issued and no return has been made thereto, and especially if a demurrer has been interposed, allegations on information and belief may be sufficient to authorize an injunction.[89]

Verification positive in part. If the affidavit is positive in part and in part on information and belief, it is insufficient if the affidavit and bill leave it indefinite and uncertain as to which allegations are positively verified and which are stated on information and belief; but if the bill and affidavit permit the positive allegations to be distinguished from those which are stated to be on information and belief, and if there are enough material allegations positively sworn to, a bill thus verified will support issuance of a temporary injunction.[90]

Verification of an amended petition repeating the material allegations of the original and unverified petition, and the further fact that affidavits of petitioners were submitted at the hearing, has been held sufficient basis for issuance of an injunction.[91]

Amendment of verification. Where injunctive relief has been granted on the basis of a petition and verification defective in that it was merely on belief, and immediately on the manner of verification being called to the attention of the court plaintiff pursuant to leave so amended the verification as to make it positive in character, the court may permit the injunction to stand on the basis of the amended verification.[92]

(3) Entitling Affidavits

Affidavits submitted in support of an application for an injunction should be entitled in the cause and show that they were made for the particular case.

It has been held that affidavits should be entitled in the cause and show that they were made for use in the particular case;[93] otherwise they will not be admitted.[94] However, under the practice of the federal courts, it is not an objection to affidavits filed with a bill and motion for a preliminary injunction in support of such motion that they were previously made and signed and are not entitled in the cause, where it reasonably appears that they were made for the purpose of being used in a suit between the parties.[95]

c. By Whom Affidavit Made

Affidavits in support of an application for injunction should be made by persons knowing the facts, who may be agents, and by persons falling within the contemplation of any statutory provisions governing the matter.

Affidavits submitted in support of an application for an injunction should be made by persons knowing the facts.[96] Agents are competent to make the necessary affidavits in the absence of their principals, if they know the facts.[97]

Under statutes providing that no injunction shall be granted unless the applicant shall present his petition therefor verified by his affidavit, as construed in connection with other statutory provisions authorizing affidavits in civil suits generally by either a party or his agent or attorney, an affidavit supporting a bill for injunction may be verified by the principal, his agent or attorney,[98] but the affidavit of one not shown to be any of the three is insufficient.[99]

d. Notice, and Service of Affidavits

Complainant seeking an injunction should give due and timely notice, as by service of copies of his pleading and supporting affidavits in compliance with rule or statute.

Copies of the complaint and affidavits in support of an application for injunctive relief should be served on the opposite party within the time limited by applicable statute or rule,[1] and failure to comply with such requirements has been held to constitute a jurisdictional defect.[2]

After reservation of case for decision. Where, on the hearing of a rule on a petition for injunction, the judge reserves his decision, it is error for him, pending the consideration of the case and before his decision is made, to permit plaintiff to amend the petition in a material particular and submit affidavits in support of the petition as thus amended, without giving notice to the opposite party of such amendment and affidavits, in order that such party may meet them if he should so desire.[3]

e. Affidavits in Rebuttal

Ordinarily the plaintiff may not file affidavits in rebuttal of the defendant's counter-affidavits; but under special circumstances such rebuttal affidavits may be filed and considered. New matter set up in defense is open to attack by the plaintiff's supplemental affidavits.

While special circumstances and leave of court may warrant the consideration and filing of affidavits in rebuttal,[4] in the absence of such excep-

New matter set up in defense may be contradicted or explained by affidavits.[7]

§ 196. —— Answer

a. In general
b. Answer denying equities of bill
c. Character of verification and denials

a. In General

A duly verified answer may serve the double function of pleading and proof, sometimes being regarded as evidentially equivalent to an affidavit. The defendant's sworn answer may become conclusive in his favor if not overcome by satisfactory testimony in opposition, as by two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances evidentially equivalent to a second witness.

A duly verified answer may serve the office of both pleading and evidence on application for an injunction,[8] and may be given the evidential effect of an affidavit of defendant.[9] Even though averments in an answer have been stricken on demurrer and were not formally introduced into evidence, the court on the hearing may nevertheless consider such averments as evidence against defendant.[10]

Weight of answer as evidence. On an application for an injunction the court will apply the familiar rule, discussed in Equity § 473, that, where a sworn answer is responsive to the bill and clearly and positively denies its allegations, it is not only evidence for defendant, but is conclusive in his favor unless overcome by the satisfactory testimony of two opposing witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by other facts and circumstances equivalent in weight to a second witness;[11] but the rule is inapplicable where the answer is on information and belief,[12] or where the answer fails to deny important allegations.[13] It has further been held that the foregoing rule does not apply where the injunction bill is verified, as the oath to the bill stands against the oath to the answer;[14] but in such a case it is necessary to have at least one witness in support of the bill in order to decide the issue in complainant's favor.[15] Where the oath to the answer has been waived, it has been held that the answer, although sworn to, is entitled only to the evidential weight of an ex parte affidavit.[16]

b. Answer Denying Equities of Bill

(1) In general
(2) Discretion of court
(3) Denial of intent to continue acts

(1) In General

The general rule is that a temporary injunction may not be granted on a hearing in limine on bill and answer where the defendant duly denies the allegations on which the complainant claims the right to injunctive relief; but where the denial is not explicit and circumstantial it will not preclude the granting of an injunction in an otherwise proper case.

Generally speaking, where the facts constituting complainant's claim for injunctive relief are controverted on oath by defendant, the court will not interfere at the initial stage of proceedings seeking an injunction but will refuse to grant an injunction before hearing on the merits.[17] On motions for an injunction made on bill and answer, statements made under oath in the answer, where responsive to the bill, will be taken as true,[18] and if in such answer under oath or accompanying affidavits the facts constituting the claim of complainant for the interposition of the court are controverted by defendant the court generally will not interfere but will deny the injunction.[19] The reason is that such an answer is deemed to overcome the equities of the bill[20] or to render the truth of its allegations at least doubtful.[21] It has been held that it is within the discretion of the court to refuse an injunction as to all the defendants, even though some of them failed to answer.[22]

Where the answer contains nothing construable as a substantial denial of the equities of the bill, award of an injunction may be proper,[23] as where the answer is not a full, explicit, and circumstantial denial, and on the entire showing of both sides it appears reasonably probable that complainant has the right which he claims.[24]

Where, on a hearing on bill and answer, there are no admissions in the answer aiding plaintiff on the merits, plaintiff can prevail only on the strength of averments in his bill for injunction which are not denied in the answer.[25]

Labor disputes

(1) The statute prohibiting the issuance of a temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute except after hearing the testimony of witnesses in open court changes the general rule that, when material allegations of a bill are met by full, explicit, and circumstantial denial under oath, a preliminary injunction will not issue, and an injunction cannot be refused as formerly merely because of a denial on oath.—Isolantite, Inc., v. United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America, 22 A.2d 796, 130 N.J.Eq. 506, modified on other grounds Isolantite, Inc. v. United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, C. I. O., 29 A.2d 183, 132 N.J.Eq. 163.

(2) On the other hand, it has also been held that, in suit for injunction restraining members of union and others from picketing complainant's place of business, interference with business, violence, etc., where complainant's affidavits in support of bill were met by a full, explicit and circumstantial denial under oath in defendant's counteraffidavits, granting of preliminary injunction was error.—Heine's, Inc., v. plaintiff's alleged equities are met by denial in a verified answer is applicable only where the application for injunctive relief is heard on bill and answer,[26] and where the case comes up on a hearing on bill and answer, and denial of the immediate application for injunction would be proper because of defendant's sworn denial of complainant's equities, either party then has the right to introduce evidence, after which the court in granting or denying injunctive relief will be governed by the weight and legal effect of the evidence introduced.[27] It is the duty of the court in such cases to exercise its discretion on a consideration of all testimony offered and to determine the application in accordance with the rights of the parties irrespective of denials in the answer or conflicts in the affidavits filed,[28] and injunction may be granted where the evidence of disinterested witnesses supports complainant or the court is otherwise satisfied that his allegations are true.[29]

Despite denial by the defendant of the equities of the complainant's bill for injunction, the court may in its discretion award injunctive relief on a hearing on the bill and answer where exceptional circumstances so warrant, as where a denial of injunction would in effect amount to a decision on the merits defeating entirely the object of the bill.

The general rule against granting injunctive relief in the face of defendant's denial of plaintiff's equities, as discussed supra subdivision b (1) of this section, is subject to exceptions,[30] and, notwithstanding positive denials under oath in the answer, the court has discretion to grant a preliminary injunction, and it will not be denied as of course.[31] In such a case the court may grant an injunction where a denial of an injunction would be in effect a decision on the merits and would defeat entirely the objects of the bill;[32] where irreparable injury might result from a denial of the injunction;[33] where the bill contains charges of fraud;[34] where it appears probable that the complaint will on final hearing be found to be true;[35] or where the right to an injunction depends on the interpretation to be placed by the court on a written instrument.[36] Where the cause was submitted on the pleadings and there was enough of the bill undenied to warrant temporary injunction, it may be granted, notwithstanding the rule that the court shall not grant an injunction on a sworn bill and answer without hearing evidence supporting the allegations of the bill.[37]

(3) Denial of Intent to Continue Acts

As a general rule an injunction will be denied where the defendant denies intent to continue the acts sought to be enjoined and there is nothing to show the falsity of his denial.

An injunction will usually,[38] but not always,[39] be refused when defendant denies having any intention to do the acts in question, and there is no evidence that his denial is untrue; but in these circumstances leave to renew the application at any time will be given.[40]

c. Character of Verification and Denials

To be entitled to such weight as to preclude issuance of an injunction the defendant's answer should be positive in character and verification and not be made merely on information and belief, or consist merely of new matter in avoidance.

cause the denial of the motion for an injunction, it must be sworn to positively and not on information and belief,[41] and it must be responsive to the bill and contain a denial of the facts there, and not a mere denial of conclusions or mere allegations of new matter in avoidance which can be established only by evidence.[42]

Answer of corporation. In some jurisdictions,[43] but not in others,[44] the answer of a corporation under seal, without oath, has been held sufficient to prevent the issuance or procure the dissolution of an injunction.

§ 197. —— Counter-Affidavits

Defendant may support his opposition to an application for temporary injunction by counter-affidavits and the court may grant or deny injunctive relief on the basis of the affidavits submitted. In such cases the court ordinarily will deny an injunction where the affidavits are in conflict and evenly balanced, unless special circumstances warrant issuance of an injunction to preclude irreparable injury to the plaintiff and without substantial damage to the defendant pending a final decision on the merits on a full hearing.

Affidavits may be used in opposition to the motion for an injunction,[45] whether made by defendant or others,[46] and although no plea or answer has been interposed;[47] but affidavits in opposition to a motion for temporary injunction constitute part of the record only for the purpose of determining the propriety of the temporary injunction.[48] Such affidavits should contradict the material allegations of the complaint, and where they fail to do so or are otherwise insufficient they will not preclude issuance of an injunction.[49] They should state appropriate facts and not legal conclusions, and the latter, if contained therein, must be disregarded.[50]

The court cannot determine the credibility of witnesses testifying only by affidavit,[51] determination of the final merits of the case ordinarily will not be made on conflicting affidavits,[52] and in the absence of the witnesses the affidavits on each side are entitled to equal weight.[53] This does not mean, however, that the court is precluded by the number of affidavits in event of a conflict between them; it is, on the contrary, required to examine all proofs in the light of reasonable probability as gauged by the ordinary experiences and contacts of the court;[54] and, where a consideration of the affidavits filed on each side convinces the court of the equity of plaintiff's case, it may issue a temporary injunction.[55] Where the evidence is equally balanced on affidavits, the court will not issue a preliminary injunction unless it is shown that irreparable injury will result to plaintiff, should he finally prevail, through denial of the preliminary injunction, without material injury to defendant if the latter should prevail.[56]

§ 198. Dismissal before Hearing

a. Voluntary dismissal
b. Involuntary dismissal
c. Procedure
d. Operation and effect

a. Voluntary Dismissal

Complainant in an injunction suit may discontinue on payment of costs if defendant is not prejudiced thereby.

It has been stated, as a general rule, that the right of complainant in an injunction suit to discontinue the action or suffer a nonsuit is not absolute, but rests in the sound discretion of the court.[58] However, in accordance with the general rules discussed in Dismissal and Nonsuit § 7, and in Equity § 563, ordinarily, on payment of costs,[59] plaintiff in a suit for an injunction may discontinue his suit as a matter of right where no rights of defendant as against plaintiff have accrued,[60] or where he will not be deprived of some affirmative advantage to which he is properly entitled.[61]

Where suit is brought by plaintiffs in behalf of themselves and of all others similarly situated, they cannot dismiss the suit, against the objection of the others.[62]

Time of dismissal. It has been held that complainant may voluntarily discontinue or dismiss his suit at any time before interlocutory or final decree;[63] or after a cross bill has been filed, where the cross bill is for a cause of action for which cross complainant would not be entitled to file an original bill;[64] or even after a full hearing on an application for temporary injunction and after the judge has announced his purpose to deny the injunction;[65] but that it is discretionary with the court whether it will reduce the judgment to writing and make it a part of the case or not.[66] Similarly complainant may dismiss his petition for an injunction where there are other persons who might intervene, if the dismissal is effected before such intervention.[67] On the other hand, after a decree, whether final or interlocutory, has been made, by which defendant,[68] or intervening parties,[69] have acquired rights, plaintiff will not be permitted to dismiss the bill without their consent. However, the denial of a motion for a preliminary injunction after a hearing fixes no such right in defendant as to prevent complainant from taking a voluntary nonsuit on the bill,[70] the same having also been held to be true where a preliminary injunction issued in the case has been dissolved.[71]

Effect of dismissal. A voluntary dismissal without prejudice of a bill for an injunction does not adjudicate the rights of defendant with respect to the subject matter of the action, although it may constitute an admission that a preliminary injunction issued in the case was wrongfully issued.[72] Hence if plaintiff withdraws his suit before a final determination of the issues, he is not concluded from pursuing another remedy,[73] from bringing a new suit for injunction for the same cause,[74] or from making an application for reinstatement.[75]

Under some statutes, however, if the answer of defendant is purely defensive, the voluntary discontinuance does preclude defendant from thereafter amending his pleadings, and the court from continuing with the trial. It prevents defendant or the court from bringing in new parties by way of intervention, and rendering or entering judgment in

b. Involuntary Dismissal

(1) In general
(2) Grounds

(1) In General

It has been held that a motion to dismiss a bill for an injunction before trial or answer is addressed to the sound discretion of the court. However, as a general rule, the court should not dismiss before trial if it can reasonably be conceived from the allegations that complainant could establish his right at the trial. If issues of fact appear, they cannot be adjudicated on the motion to dismiss.

Whether a motion to dismiss a bill for an injunction before answer or trial should be granted or refused is largely a matter for the discretion of the court.[77] If it appears to the court to be more convenient and just, the questions raised by the motion will be reserved for trial.[78]

It has been stated as the best judicial policy for a court not to pass on a motion to dismiss a bill for an injunction until the parties have brought in all the facts on final hearing and all the proofs are before the court.[79] So if under the allegations of the bill it can reasonably be conceived that the complainant at the trial could establish a case entitling him to the injunction, a motion to dismiss should not be granted.[80]

An issue of fact cannot be adjudicated on a motion to dismiss the bill before a trial.[81]

One not a party to the suit has no standing to move for the dismissal of the bill.[82]

(2) Where the bill for an injunction raises intricate, novel, and important legal questions, and the affidavits in favor of, and opposed to, a motion for preliminary injunction indicate that on final hearing many facts alleged in the bill will be seriously challenged, defendant's motion to dismiss the bill will be denied, without prejudice to its right to take by answer whatever advantage it might have by the motion.—Oneida Community v. (2) Grounds
- (a) Want of jurisdiction
- (b) Want of equity on face of bill
- (c) Defect of parties
- (d) Failure to prosecute
- (e) Change of circumstances
- (f) Dissolution of preliminary injunction
- (g) Miscellaneous grounds

(a) Want of Jurisdiction

Want of jurisdiction in the court is a ground for the dismissal of a bill for an injunction.

Where the court is without jurisdiction in a suit for an injunction,[83] as where the amount involved is not within the court's jurisdiction,[84] the suit will be dismissed. So a dismissal is proper where the action is brought in the wrong county or district,[85] or where a court of concurrent jurisdiction has secured prior jurisdiction of the cause of action.[86]

That an injunction should not issue in a particular case is not a basis for dismissal of the bill for want of jurisdiction, if the court has the power to issue an injunction in a proper case.[87] So the insufficiency of affidavits to warrant the issuance of a temporary injunction does not warrant the dismissal of the bill, if its allegations are sufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction after a final hearing.[88]

(b) Want of Equity on Face of Bill

Want of equity on the face of a bill for an injunction is ordinarily ground for dismissal thereof before trial.

If a bill in equity states a good cause of action for an injunction and no other dismissible defect appears, the bill should not be dismissed before trial.[89] On the other hand, a bill for an injunction which does not present a case of equitable cognizance or does not show complainants' right to an injunction may be dismissed.[90] Thus, where it is apparent

State Labor Relations Board asked permission to intervene, the board could not make a motion to dismiss the complaint until it had been permitted to intervene.—United Baking Co. v. Bakery and Confectionery Workers' Union, Local 221, 14 N.Y.S.2d 74, 257 App.Div. 501, affirming 9 N.Y.S.2d 964, 170 Misc. 199.

Cross bill

Where bill seeking to enjoin prosecution of action at law on note was required to be dismissed because equity was without jurisdiction, cross bill was also required to be dismissed, since, if complainant had no right to draw controversy out of law court into chancery court, defendant had no right through cross bill to keep it there.—Flaherty v. Industrial Trust Co., 178 A. 586, 20 Del. Ch. 403.

Jurisdiction of party

(1) Since an injunction can only operate in personam, unless jurisdiction of the party can be acquired, the proceedings should be dismissed on appropriate motion.—Southern Mills, Inc. v. Armstrong, 27 S.E.2d 281, 223 N.C. 495.

that complainant has an adequate remedy at law, the bill will be dismissed,[91] except where by statute a resort to the wrong remedy or procedure is not a ground for dismissal.[92] However, it has been held that a bill should not be dismissed on the ground of want of equity on its face, unless it is manifest that no amendment can help it,[93] although failure or refusal of complaint to amend after opportunity so to do is afforded will justify its dismissal.[94]

If the allegations of the bill are sufficient to set out a cause of action for any of the relief sought, it will not be dismissed.[95]

That complainant seeks more relief than he is entitled to under the allegations of his bill for an injunction does not justify dismissal of the bill.[96]

Effect of abstract attached to bill

Where plaintiffs' petition to enjoin trespasses on land contained an unqualified averment that plaintiffs owned the land and there was nothing in an amendment to show that the averment was limited to title as shown by an attached abstract, trial court properly overruled defendant's motion to strike the petition on the ground that the abstract was defective.—Gray v. If from the face of the petition it appears that there are persons with interests in the subject matter of the litigation who are not before the court, the bill should not be dismissed for want of equity until such interested parties are before the court.[97]

(c) Defect of Parties

Nonjoinder of a necessary party is ground for dismissal of a bill for an injunction; mere misjoinder is not, under some statutes, although the bill will be dismissed as to parties improperly joined.

Under the rules or practice of some jurisdictions, the failure to join necessary parties is ground for dismissal of a bill for an injunction.[98] Under some statutes, however, a mere misjoinder is not ground for dismissal of the bill,[99] although the bill may be dismissed as to parties improperly joined in the action.[1]

Where only part of defendants have been served with process, the bill should not be dismissed on motion of those who have appeared.[2]

Reinstatement. A necessary party who has not been joined has the right to have the dismissal set aside and the suit reinstated.[3]

(d) Failure to Prosecute

The bill in an injunction suit may be dismissed for lack of diligence in its prosecution.

In accordance with general rules discussed in Dismissal and Nonsuit § 65, and Equity § 569 a, the bill in an injunction suit may be dismissed for failure of complainant to use due diligence in its prosecution.[4] The failure of complainant's counsel to appear on the date set for argument of defendant's motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction issued in the case, does not constitute such a want of prosecution as would justify a dismissal of the bill.[5]

(e) Change of Circumstances

The bill in an injunction suit may be dismissed by a change in circumstances subsequent to its filing.

If plaintiff had a right of action at the time of filing the bill but has lost it by a subsequent change of circumstances, the bill may be dismissed.[6] On the other hand a bill for a permanent injunction will not be dismissed merely because defendant desists from doing acts which he was enjoined from doing by a preliminary injunction.[7] Where the change in circumstances renders the issuance of an injunction unnecessary, the bill should be dismissed as moot rather than on the merits.[8]

Inequitable conduct on the part of complainant after filing of the bill is a ground for its dismissal.[9]

(f) Dissolution of Preliminary Injunction

As a general rule on a mere motion to dissolve an injunction the bill may not be dismissed.

The general rule is that, on a mere motion to dissolve an injunction, the court is without authority on granting the motion to dismiss the bill,[10] except where by agreement the whole case is considered on the motion to dissolve.[11] Plaintiff still has the right to a trial of the case on the merits and to such relief as the case may then warrant,[12] and to amend the bill, if so advised,[13] unless the right to such trial is expressly waived;[14] and it is error to dismiss, although plaintiff made no request for a trial on the merits,[15] no motion to retain the bill being necessary;[16] and especially is this so where the merits turn on grave questions of law or conceded facts;[17] and the rule applies with full force in case of the dissolution of an injunction at chambers or in vacation,[18] and this is true in such a case, even though the temporary injunction is dissolved on the filing of an answer swearing away the equities of the bill.[19]

Exceptions or limitations to the general rule are recognized in some decisions.[20] Thus, it has been held that, where the injunction asked for is not ancillary, but the primary and principal relief prayed for, there is no reason for retaining the bill, if, on hearing, on bill and answer, or bill, answer, and depositions, it appears to the court that there is no ground for issuing or granting the injunction on the merits;[21] that, where a bill to restrain a suit at law is in effect a bill for discovery merely and the answer denies the equity of the bill, it may be dismissed on dissolution of the injunction;[22] and that, where an injunction is the only relief sought and the bill on its face shows want of equity, the court on sustaining a motion to dissolve the injunction may dismiss the bill,[23] the view being taken that the motion is equivalent to a demurrer,[24] although no such limitation is recognized by other decisions which hold that the bill should stand, even though the injunction be dissolved for want of equity,[25] or that the bill will not be dismissed without first giving plaintiff an opportunity to amend.[26] A further exception which has been recognized is objections to the jurisdiction which, being established, at once terminate the proceedings in which they are relied on whether taken by plea or answer.[27]

Where action for injunction was submitted on motion to dissolve temporary injunction, and not on merits for final decree on pleadings and proof, and court improperly dismissed bill, the court in restoring the case to trial docket within thirty days was acting within its plenary power and did not abuse its discretion in restoring the parties to their status quo.—Ex parte Baptist Tabernacle of Anniston, 8 So.2d 170, 242 Ala. 670.

Dismissal at next term after dissolution. In some jurisdictions statutes require that the bill shall be dismissed of course at the next term after the dissolution of the injunction, unless cause is shown why the case should be retained.[28] However, the statutes do not apply where other relief is demanded,[29] or in case of a dissolution in vacation or at chambers.[30]

Where a bill asks other relief than an injunction, the bill should not be dismissed on dissolution of the injunction, but should be continued for a hearing on the right to the other relief demanded.[31]

Dissolution as to some of the parties. On the dissolution of the injunction, the bill may be dismissed as to a part of the parties and retained as to the remainder.[32]

(g) Miscellaneous Grounds

Various other grounds have been considered by the courts on applications for dismissal of the bill in an injunction suit.

That the case as presented does not call for the issuance of a preliminary injunction, does not of itself call for the dismissal of the complaint sufficient in itself.[33] So it has been held that grounds for dissolving a temporary injunction, discussed infra §§ 241–246, such as the failure to file an injunction bond,[34] defects in the bond,[35] or want of an affidavit or a defective affidavit,[36] do not warrant a dismissal of the suit. However, under the practice of some jurisdictions a bill may be dismissed without regard to the merits if it be found by the court that a temporary injunction was improperly issued in the case.[37] It has also been held that where a restraining order is granted on condition that a proper indemnity bond be posted, failure to comply with such condition justifies dismissal of the complaint.[38]

If defendant in his answer concedes plaintiff's claims and disavows any purpose or intention to commit the acts which plaintiff seeks to restrain, the suit may be dismissed at the discretion of the court or retained with leave to plaintiff to move for an injunction on defendant's disregarding his avowed intentions.[39]

c. Procedure

The dismissal of a bill in an injunction suit may be sought by demurrer or motion, the question presented being generally whether the bill states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The bill in an injunction suit may be dismissed for want of equity on demurrer[40] or on motion to dismiss,[41] provided an amendment could not help the bill,[42] the bill on such a motion being taken by the court as amended with respect to amendable defects.[43]

There is no objection to combining an application for dissolution of a preliminary injunction with a motion to dismiss the bill as insufficient on questions theretofore raised by demurrer.[44]

On court's own motion. In some jurisdictions the bill cannot be dismissed by the court on its own motion before answer.[45]

At what stage of proceeding. In general a bill demanding injunctive relief may be dismissed at any stage of the proceedings before the final decree.[46]

46. Tex.—Merifee v. Myers, 33 Tex. 690.

While, as considered supra subdivision b (2) (f) of this section, under some circumstances, the bill may be dismissed at the time of the dissolution of a temporary injunction, it has been held improper for a court before answer or demurrer to dismiss a bill on a hearing, on the bill and affidavits, of a motion to continue the preliminary injunction.[47]

The bill may be dismissed on a proper showing after a hearing on the application for a preliminary injunction;[48] but not at an interlocutory hearing in a case which seeks additional relief.[49] Where the answer has been filed and the case called for trial on its merits, it is too late for defendant to move to dismiss a bill on the ground that complainant has an adequate remedy at law.[50]

At term, chambers, or in vacation. Under the practice of some jurisdictions a motion to dismiss an action for an injunction should be heard at term,[51] and it is generally held that a judge, at chambers or in vacation, has no authority to dismiss the bill,[52] but on motion being made to dismiss the bill should leave further action in the case to be taken at a regular term of court.[53] It has been held, however, that the bill may be dismissed in vacation as well as in term if the court is without jurisdiction.[54]

On the death of a party a reasonable time for the appointment of his personal representative and making him a party in the case by amended bill and bringing him into court by proper process will be allowed, and the bill will not be dismissed until such reasonable time shall have passed unheeded.[55]

Renewal of motion. After denial of a motion to dismiss, the court still has jurisdiction to reconsider its action and make final disposition of the motion.[56]

Matters considered. In accordance with general rules considered in Dismissal and Nonsuit § 71 c, a motion to dismiss a bill for an injunction presents generally the issue whether the bill states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,[57] which issue must be determined from the bill itself;[58] the court may not consider the affidavits or other evidence submitted on the application for the injunction.[59]

For the purpose of the motion, the facts properly set forth in the bill stand admitted and are to be taken as true.[60] This is not so as to conclusions of fact.[61]

On a motion to dismiss before an answer on the merits, only procedural points are considered, not the merits.[62]

On a motion to dismiss a bill seeking an injunction to restrain enforcement of an ordinance, the court may inquire into the reasons for the enactment of the ordinance.[63]

Failure to mention a point in the briefs submitted on a motion to dismiss has been considered an abandonment of such point.[64]

d. Operation and Effect

The dismissal of the bill constitutes a dissolution of a preliminary injunction issued in the case. If dismissed without prejudice the rights of the parties are left unaffected.

The dismissal of a bill ipso facto dissolves a temporary injunction already allowed in the action,[65] and is conclusive evidence that the injunction was wrongfully sued out,[66] although made "without prejudice,"[67] or that it was improvidently granted;[68] and even though the dismissal is erroneous, an action at law against the prosecution of which a temporary injunction is thereby dissolved is reinstated and may be prosecuted to judgment.[69] So the dismissal from a bill of all charges on which the injunction was issued dissolves the injunction.[70] Where an injunction is granted restraining defendant until further order of the court, a failure to procure an order making it perpetual does not ipso facto dissolve the injunction; it continues in force until dissolved or modified.[71]

A dismissal not on the merits,[72] such as a dismissal for want of prosecution,[73] or for want of jurisdiction,[74] is not res judicata. The dismissal of a bill for an injunction without prejudice leaves the rights and claims of complainant unaffected.[75] held before a tribunal having jurisdiction. Statutes regulating the trial or hearing must be complied with.

Plaintiff in an injunction suit has the right to have his case tried and decided on the merits by a proper tribunal having jurisdiction to do so.[77]

Questions of law or fact. The question of whether the circumstances are such as to justify the issuance of an injunction presents a question of fact for determination[78] by the trier of the facts.[79] In the absence of a disputed question of fact, whether legal wrong exists or is threatened which requires injunctive relief is a question of law.[80]

Statutory provisions generally. The trial or hearing of a suit or application for an injunction is frequently the subject of statutory provision.[81] Statutes regulating the trial or hearing of an injunction suit must be complied with.[82]

(2) Permanent injunction

(1) Preliminary Injunction

Except as statutes otherwise provide, the court may under certain circumstances issue a preliminary injunction without a trial or hearing at which the parties have had an opportunity to be heard. Ordinarily, however, such an injunction should not be granted without such a hearing.

As a general rule, under the practice or statutes of the various jurisdictions, a temporary injunction should not be issued without a hearing at which the interested parties have been given an opportunity to be heard,[83] if practicable.[84] However, where the need for the preliminary injunction is pressing and the threatened injury or loss is imminent and irreparable, the court is usually held to have power to issue the same without a hearing,[85] in the exercise of its judicial discretion.[86] The court should be reluctant to grant a temporary injunction without a hearing[87] and should not issue the same on an ex parte hearing unless the right thereto is clearly established.[88]

Under the statutes of some jurisdictions, no injunction may be issued in the type of case specified except after a hearing of the evidence of the witnesses, in open court, with an opportunity for cross-examination.[89] Thereunder no injunction can be issued, in a case covered thereby, on affidavits alone.[90]

(2) Permanent Injunction

A trial or hearing at which the interested parties have an opportunity to be heard is ordinarily essential to the issuance of a permanent injunction.

A court of equity will not make a decree for a perpetual injunction, which is to operate directly on the parties in interest, without giving them an opportunity to be heard.[91] Unless the right is waived,[92] the parties are entitled to a trial in open court, with the right to have the evidence heard, either by deposition or orally,[93] and the opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses.[94] As considered infra § 200 b, it is not proper to issue a permanent injunction on the hearing of an application for a preliminary injunction or on motion to dissolve heard before answer. A permanent injunction should issue, or a temporary injunction should be made permanent, only on final hearing after the cause is at issue,[95] and after notice to defendant.[96]

Notice of application for injunction see supra §§ 179, 180.

In general, the parties to an injunction suit have a right to insist on a prompt trial of the issues raised.[97] Ordinarily, however, the time when a suit for injunction may be brought on for hearing is dependent on statutes and rules of court,[98] which must be complied with if the court is to have jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause.[99]

As considered supra § 198 b (2) (b), the court may proceed to hear the cause on its merits before it is formally set for hearing, on a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, if defendant is present in court and offers no objections.

Before appearance or answer. In the absence of a waiver by defendant,[1] a suit for an injunction cannot be set down for a hearing before expiration of defendant's time to appear or answer.[2]

In vacation. It has been held that a suit for a mandatory injunction can be heard and determined in vacation only in the manner prescribed by the statutes, or by the consent of the parties. The fact that defendant appears and contests the issuance of the injunction sought is not equivalent to consent that the cause be heard finally in vacation.[3]

Notice of hearing. Notice of the time for the hearing must be given in compliance with the governing statute or rule.[4]

(2) Continuances

Within the limits of governing statutes or rules of court, an application for a continuance of the hearing in an injunction case is addressed to the sound discretion of the court.

Except as a special statute or rule of court may vary the same,[5] the rules relating to continuances in general, considered in Continuances, particularly those applicable to suits in equity, considered in Equity § 484, apply to continuances in injunction suits.[6] While sufficient ground for a continuance must be present,[7] within the limits of governing statutes,[8] whether or not a postponement or con-

Superior Court in and for Sierra County, 64 P.2d 738, 18 Cal. App.2d 652.

Labor dispute case

(1) Under some statutes, due and personal notice of the trial or hearing must be given in a labor dispute case, in such manner as the court may direct, to all known persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the public officials of the county or city in which the wrongful acts have been threatened or committed, and who are charged with the duty of protecting complainant's property. The requirements as to notice under such statutes must be complied with before an injunction may issue in a case coming within its terms.—Starr v. Laundry and Dry Cleaning Workers' Local Union No. 101, 63 P.2d 1104, 155 Or. 634.

(2) "The purpose of such notice is obvious. The officers may, upon receiving it, give such attention to the controversy that the objectionable conduct may be terminated before the time fixed for the hearing shall have arrived. It is a salutary provision and one that commends itself as a step toward rendering government by injunction unnecessary."—Starr v. Laundry and Dry Cleaning Workers' Local Union No. 101, supra.

8. In California

(1) Under Code Civ.Proc. § 527, requiring an order to show cause containing a temporary restraining order to set the return date at not more than ten days from the date of the order, the court may not postpone the hearing against wishes of defendant to a date beyond such ten-day period, while also continuing the restraining order.—Agricultural Prorate Commission v. Superior Court in and for Riverside County, 85 P.2d 898, 30 Cal.App.2d 154—Agricultural Prorate Commission v. Superior Court in and for Riverside County, 85 P.2d 899, 30 Cal.App.2d 156.

(2) Under this statute defendant has an absolute right to one continuance for a reasonable period, to prepare to meet the application for the preliminary injunction.—Mctinuance should be ordered rests in the sound discretion of the court.[9]

d. Papers and Evidence on Hearing

(1) In general
(2) Preliminary injunction
(3) Permanent injunction

(1) In General

The court is confined to the pleadings and supporting proof in determining the issues raised in an injunction case.

In determining the issues presented in a suit for an injunction the court is confined to the pleadings and the supporting evidence.[10]

Offer of proof. In accordance with general rules, a proper offer of proof may be essential to require the reception of evidence in an injunction suit.[11]

Reopening case to receive further evidence. The matter of the reopening of a case to permit additional evidence to be introduced rests in the sound discretion of the court.[12] It is discretionary with the judge sitting at chambers, on an application for injunction, to reopen the case for more testimony, on discovery of additional witnesses by one of the parties after argument, and while holding the matter for decision.[13]

(2) Preliminary Injunction

An application for a preliminary injunction may be heard on affidavits only; the court may in its discretion permit the introduction of oral evidence.

An application for a temporary or preliminary injunction may be heard and determined on affidavits only,[14] and in the absence of statute or court rule to the contrary, on the hearing of such an application the court is not required to permit the introduction of evidence other than the affidavits which are made part of, or are presented with, the pleadings.[15] However, the trial court may in its discretion hear oral testimony,[16] and determine the application on the pleading and proof submitted.[17]

An affidavit tendered and received in evidence on the hearing of an application for an injunction, where no objection is made on the ground of incompetency of the witness, and no motion made to withdraw or rule out the affidavit, may be considered whether or not the witness was competent.[18]

Use of answer. On an application for a preliminary injunction, defendant may at once file his answer, which must be considered and given its proper effect in deciding as to the propriety of issuing a temporary injunction.[19] However, an application for an injunction may be heard without answers be-

Donald v. Superior Court in and for Sierra County, 64 P.2d 738, 18 Cal. App.2d 652.

(3) However, the court may not arbitrarily divest itself of jurisdiction to hear an application for an injunction by continuing hearing of order to show cause to time more than ten days from date thereof.—McDonald v. ing filed by those persons who are merely formal parties.[20]

Objections to affidavits. General objections to the introduction of affidavits on the ground that the facts set out are irrelevant will be overruled if any of the facts are relevant.[21] Supplemental affidavits filed without permission on a motion for a temporary injunction will be disregarded by the court on objection by defendant.[22]

(3) Permanent Injunction

The issues in an injunction suit ordinarily may not be finally determined on affidavits alone or on evidence submitted at a hearing on an application for a preliminary injunction.

Ordinarily it is improper for the issues in an injunction suit to be heard on affidavits only and a perpetual injunction granted thereon.[23]

Unless the parties otherwise agree,[24] the cause may not be finally determined on the evidence submitted at the hearing on the application for the preliminary injunction.[25] However, if no additional testimony is adduced by the parties on the final hearing, the court will look to the bill and testimony given at the preliminary hearing to determine whether the temporary injunction was properly issued in the first instance.[26]

e. Inspection of Subject Matter

An inspection may be ordered in an injunction case after issue has been joined.

In a proper case in an injunction suit an order for an inspection of the subject matter of the suit may be granted on motion after issue has been joined,[27] but not before.[28]

f. Submission of Issue to Jury

To justify submission of an issue in an injunction case to a jury there must be sufficient evidence in support thereof. Appropriate instructions should be given on submitting the case to the jury.

On an application for a preliminary injunction no right of trial by jury exists.[29]

Where a jury trial may be had in an injunction case, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Juries § 35, also 35 C.J. p 170 note 60–p 173 note 81, to justify or require submitting an issue to the jury there must be sufficient evidence in support thereof.[30]

Instructions. In a suit for an injunction tried before a jury, the court by appropriate instructions may, and should, submit the issues in the case as raised by the pleadings and evidence,[31] and properly charge on the law applicable to the case under the evidence.[32]

Direction of verdict. A verdict should not be directed in a suit for an injunction tried before a jury unless the evidence warrants.[33]

g. Verdict and Findings

Findings of fact, where required, must be within the pleadings and evidence, and be otherwise sufficient to justify injunctive relief.

Where findings of fact are unnecessary in cases of equitable cognizance, as discussed in Equity § 493 b, no such findings need be made in support of the decree in a suit for an injunction.[34] However, findings by the court sufficient to sustain its judgment are sometimes required,[35] and statutes prohibiting the issuance of an injunction in cases coming within its terms except after the finding of specified facts must be strictly complied with.[36]

Sufficiency of findings. Where the court purports to base its decree on the facts reported, the findings of fact must include all the facts essential to the issuance of the injunction sought.[37] In such case a general finding for complainant does not carry with it by implication a finding as to a fact essential to the issuance of the injunction.[38]

The findings must be within the issues made by the pleadings,[39] be supported by the evidence,[40] and be sufficient to justify injunctive relief if an injunction is to issue.[41] No finding need be made with respect to an allegation constituting a conclusion of law, not a statement of fact.[42] If the findings are sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief sought, he cannot complain of failure to make more extended findings.[43]

Where findings are required by statute, to justify the issuance of an injunction thereunder the findings must be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute,[44] and the record must support the

In suit to enjoin the erection of theater in a subdivision on ground that proposed building would violate general building scheme with building line restrictions, trial court erred in directing verdict in favor of defendants on issue whether there was a violation of the express building line restrictions contained in defendants' deeds, where defendants conceded that there was at least a slight violation of such express line as to some of the lots on which building was being erected.—Jones v. findings.[45]

Conclusions of law should follow or have support in the findings of fact.[46]

Verdict of jury. The verdict of a jury in an injunction case must be supported by, and be in accord with, the evidence.[47] A special verdict will authorize the chancellor to decree a perpetual injunction without the finding by the jury in express words that the perpetual injunction be granted;[48] but such a verdict must contain a finding on all the issues submitted.[49]

Construction. In accordance with the rule applicable in equity generally, as discussed in Equity § 493 g, findings of the court, master, or jury will be construed, if possible, to sustain the judgment or decree granted.[50]

Conclusiveness of jury verdict or finding. In accordance with general equity rules discussed in Equity § 510, where the trial of an injunction suit before a jury is not a matter of right the verdict or findings of a jury are advisory only, and not conclusive on the court.[51]

h. Rehearing or Second Application

The refusal of an application for a preliminary injunction does not bar a subsequent application therefor.

The refusal of an application for a preliminary injunction does not bar complainant from making a second application,[52] and, like the decision on the first application,[53] the second application is addressed to the discretion of the judge,[54] and the court may, on a subsequent application, reach a different conclusion on the same or more convincing evidence.[55] The court is not bound to adhere to its former ruling,[56] nor is it bound, in case the former application was in another court, to follow the ruling of that court,[57] although it will generally do so by way of comity.[58]

The renewal of a motion for an interlocutory injunction on grounds or on evidence which should have been presented on the first application will be discouraged,[59] and an application once refused will not be granted at a later stage except in a clear case.[60] As a general rule the second application will be denied merely on a showing that the first one was denied, unless complainant presents new and additional matter discovered since the former hearing,[61] and shows that such new grounds or matter was not reasonably discoverable at the time of the first application.[62]

i. Dismissal

A bill for an injunction may be dismissed at the final trial or hearing for any reason on which complainant may be defeated.

As stated in Equity § 579, the grounds for dismissing a bill in equity at the hearing are as broad as those on which plaintiff may be in any way defeated. Thus in a suit for an injunction, the bill will be dismissed if it appears to be without equity,[63] or if complainant fails to make out his case.[64] Noncompliance by complainant with conditions imposed by the court as a preliminary to the issuance of the injunction may constitute a ground for dismissal.[65]

In an appropriate case the bill may be dismissed as to some parties although an injunction is issued as against others.[66]

Preliminary hearing. As a general rule, in the absence of a waiver the bill may not be dismissed on the denial of an application for a temporary injunction in a case in which the injunctive relief sought is ancillary to the principal cause of action.[67] The bill may not be dismissed at such a hearing if it appears that complainant is entitled to partial relief,[68] but the court may dismiss the suit if it appears from the evidence and admissions that there is no cause of action.[69] Dismissal of bill prior to hearing is considered supra § 198.

On the merits. If the bill is dismissed after a hearing on the pleadings and proofs taken in open court, the dismissal generally is considered on the merits.[70] However, it has been held that if it appears that complainant is entitled to damages at law the dismissal should be without prejudice to such right of recovery at law.[71]

§ 200. —— Scope of Inquiry

a. In general
b. Preliminary injunction
c. Permanent injunction

a. In General

Where injunction is sought to restrain public officers in the exercise of their discretion, the court is limited to the determination of whether this discretion was abused.

As discussed supra § 108, where public officials are intrusted with discretionary power in certain matters, their exercise of such discretion will not be controlled by injunction in the absence of fraud or bad faith. Where an injunction is sought in such a case, the court is limited to a determination of whether the officials clearly abused their discretion by acting arbitrarily, corruptly, capriciously, or without credible, competent, and relevant evidence.[72]

b. Preliminary Injunction

As a general rule on an application for a preliminary injunction the only concern of the court is whether the complainant has made out a prima facie case for the issuance of such an injunction. The merits cannot be finally determined at this hearing, and no permanent injunction may issue thereat.

On a motion or application for a preliminary injunction, the court will consider the nature and object of the bill, the property or rights requiring protection, and the interests of the parties in the subject matter.[73] On the hearing of an application for a preliminary injunction, the chancellor is entitled to possess himself of the whole case from both parties, and may require defendant to submit all of his defenses together,[74] and he may go into the merits of the case as disclosed by the moving papers and the answer or affidavits in opposition thereto,[75] whether presenting issues of law or of fact,[76] for the purpose of enabling him to exercise his discretion wisely in determining whether a temporary injunction shall be granted or refused.[77] The court may pass on the sufficiency of the complaint,[78] and if the bill possesses equity, the issue to be determined on the preliminary hearing is mainly one of fact.[79] However, the judge or court is limited to the issues so raised and cannot go into outside or collateral matters.[80]

The court is not required to determine finally either the issues of law or fact involved in the action.[81] Its primary concern is whether the complainant has made out a prima facie case,[82] and the action of the trial judge or court is not predicated on an anticipated determination of issues of fact or questions of law which may be involved in the case.[83] If the essential facts are in dispute the court need not examine the merits.[84] However, while it is proper to consider the merits of the case in determining whether a preliminary injunction should issue, this is the only purpose for which the merits of the case can be considered;[85] and hence it is not proper on an application of this character to make a final determination or finding of facts,[86]

to decide the case on the merits,[87] or to determine issues more properly determinable at the final hearing or trial,[88] or grant relief which is only proper as a part of the final judgment after a trial on the merits,[89] especially where such merits depend on grave questions of law,[90] or where the hearing is had before a judge at chambers.[91]

It may be stated generally that no permanent injunction should be issued on a hearing of an application for a preliminary injunction,[92] and as a general rule no mandatory injunction will be granted thereon,[93] unless a mandatory provision is necessary to restore the status quo and prevent irreparable injury.[94] However, where there are no controverted questions of fact and the right to an injunction depends solely on the law applicable, the issue may be determined finally on the motion for a preliminary injunction.[95] So it has been said that, where the facts are undisputed and a final hearing would be but a repetition of the preliminary hearing, injunctive relief may be granted even in cases requiring a mandatory injunction.[96]

Defense of res judicata. A plea or defense of res judicata may be considered on an application for a preliminary injunction for the purpose of denying such an injunction,[97] it being proper, the circumstances or evidence warranting, for a preliminary injunction to issue in the face of such a defense.[98] However, no order may be made finally disposing of such a plea.[99]

Matters determined by interim restraint. On the return of an order to show cause why an injunction pendente lite should not issue containing an interim restraint granted after a hearing on answering affidavits and argument on notice under court rule, the entire question of the preliminary injunction may be gone into unprejudiced by the interim restraint contained in the order to show cause.[1]

Difficult questions of law and fact. Novel, difficult, or doubtful questions of law or fact will generally not be determined on preliminary hearing,[2] as, for example, the constitutionality of a statute.[3]

Questions of title. Questions of title to real estate will not be passed upon, although rights will be protected pendente lite, even though the title is doubtful.[4]

Waiver of preliminary injunction. By going to trial on the merits pursuant to agreement with defendant, plaintiff waives his right to a hearing on his application for a preliminary injunction as well as his right, if any, to the issuance of such injunction.[5]

c. Permanent Injunction

Only such questions as are necessarily involved and raised by the pleadings may be considered on the hearing for a permanent injunction.

On the hearing as to a permanent injunction, only questions necessarily involved in a determination of the right thereto can be considered,[6] and only such questions as are raised by the pleadings;[7] but all incidental questions necessarily involved must be determined.[8]

The question of title, being one of law, ordinarily will not be determined.[9]

The question of adequacy of remedy at law must be raised by demurrer, or at least be specially relied on in the answer, and cannot be raised for the first time at the hearing.[10]

Court without power to issue injunction. If the facts developed at the trial show the court to be without power to grant an injunction, it is equally without power to pass on matters otherwise for the consideration of a court of law.[11]

§ 201. Reference

In injunction cases a reference may be ordered as in equity cases generally.

In injunction cases proof may be taken before any one agreed on, to be used at the hearing.[12] In accordance with general rules of equity discussed in Equity §§ 513–562, the court may in a proper case order a reference to take testimony[13] and make findings thereon.[14] The court may also, subject to statutory provisions, order a reference in a proper case to take an account, assess damages, determine title, etc.,[15] or to determine other questions and report on the form of decree.[16] A reference, however, should not be ordered to determine an account before evidence has been adduced tending to prove the material allegations of the bill;[17] and in actions involving the title to land the legal issues should be tried before a reference of equitable issues.[18]

A master has no authority to make recommendations for a temporary injunction unless the case has been referred to him for that purpose.[19]

The master should report the form of decree, and, when specifically directed, any means or schemes by which the injury might be remedied.[20] If the report is not sufficiently specific, it will be referred back to the master for further action.[21]

It has been said that the trial court may refuse to adopt the report of the referee,[22] and found its judgment on the facts as it sees them.[23]

Objections to report. Exceptions resulting from objections duly brought in and appended to the report of the master may be considered by the court.[24] However, the exceptions do not reach error not manifest on the face of the report.[25] Where no objections to the master's report are filed or presented to the court, the court may not, in the decree approving the report and granting the injunction sought, grant leave to defendants to file objections nunc pro tunc as of the date of the decree, and provide that, having been advised of the nature and contents of the objections, they be overruled.[26]

§ 202. Conditions on Granting or Refusing Injunction

a. Preliminary injunction
b. Permanent injunction

a. Preliminary Injunction

(1) In general
(2) Giving of bond as condition of refusal

(1) In General

The court may impose such reasonable terms and conditions as it deems proper in granting or refusing a preliminary injunction.

Founded on, and arising from, the discretionary power of the court to issue or refuse to issue a preliminary injunction,[27] it is within the power of the court to impose such reasonable terms as seem proper as a condition to the granting of such an injunction[28] or as a condition to the granting of such a restraining order,[29] provided the terms imposed are not for any reason illegal.[30] It has even been said to be the duty of the court in granting injunctive relief to do so on conditions that will protect all, including the public, whose interests the injunction may affect.[31] An order for injunction is not effectual until the terms imposed thereby have been complied with.[32]

The court also has power to impose terms as a condition to the refusal of such an injunction.[33]

In granting the injunction the court may limit the time for complainant or defendant to prosecute the pending suit to a speedy determination.[34] So also, as a condition of refusing an injunction pendente lite, the court may require defendant to file his answer by a specified date[35] and consent to an early trial as specified by the order.[36]

Modification or mitigation of terms. Since terms are imposed for the sole purpose of effecting justice between the parties,[37] in the absence of any imperative statute to the contrary, the court has, it would seem, power to mitigate the terms which it has imposed or to relieve therefrom altogether whenever in the course of the proceedings it appears that it would be inequitable or oppressive to continue them.[38]

(2) Giving of Bond as Condition of Refusal

Refusal of a preliminary injunction may be conditioned on the giving of a bond by the defendant securing the complainant against loss.

Under certain circumstances a preliminary injunction will be denied on condition of defendant filing a bond to secure complainant against loss.[39] The injunction may be denied, particularly where defendant will be caused greater inconvenience by the injunction than complainant by its refusal, on condition that defendant give bond to secure complainant against loss.[40] In some cases an indemnity bond has been substituted for an injunction where the public interest demanded it and justice would be thereby subserved,[41] as where injunction is sought against taking land by a railroad company without compensating the owners,[42] but it has been held that a bond conditioned to pay damages for property taken for public use without compensation should not be substituted for an injunction.[43] However, if complainant has a clear right to the injunction itself, and a bond would not provide an adequate reparation, it is error to withhold it on the giving of a bond by defendant, or to provide for its dissolution on the giving of such bond.[44] may be conditioned on the performance of certain acts by the plaintiff, as may the refusal of such an injunction on the performance of certain acts by the defendant.

While it may be improper to impose conditions on complainant where the right to an injunction is absolute,[45] or other persons are interested in performance of the covenant involved and the object of the condition can be accomplished easily by other means,[46] the court may, except as the matter may be controlled by statute,[47] as a condition of granting the injunction, impose terms and conditions looking to the protection of all parties connected with the litigation.[48] As a condition to entering the decree, the court usually may require complainant to do what is equitable,[49] as, for example, to pay money that may be due.[50] In granting a mandatory injunction the court may order the writ to issue on such reasonable terms and conditions as will afford defendant an opportunity to comply with the decree,[51] without undue hardship, inconvenience, or expense.[52]

Alternative relief is discussed infra § 217.

Compliance with statutory requirements. A condition may be that complainant shall give notice by publication to a nonresident defendant in accordance with a statutory requirement to that effect;[53] but on final decree it is not necessary or proper to require complainant to file a bond as in the case of temporary injunctions.[54]

An injunction may be refused on condition that defendant shall do certain acts.[55] In an injunction suit by a railroad against another which had entered upon the first company's land without paying or offering to pay for or condemning the land, where defendant was operating a railroad on the land, an unconditional injunction should not be granted, as it would be injurious to the public interest, but time should be given defendant to agree with plaintiff as to compensation or to condemn the land.[56]

complaint;[58] and it has been so held in the absence of any statutory regulation of the matter.[59] However, in most jurisdictions where the court has jurisdiction over the subject matter and the parties in a proceeding, the fact that a preliminary injunction is ordered before the filing of the bill or complaint will not render the order void and, if objectionable at all, is at most an irregularity,[60] but, when this is done, the injunction does not take effect until the filing of the bill and the required undertaking.[61] In some jurisdictions a preliminary injunction cannot issue before answer,[62] and pursuant to statute an injunction may not be allowed after defendant has answered except on notice or on an order to show cause.[63] A temporary injunction may be granted before hearing and passing on a plea of privilege seeking to have the venue changed to another county,[64] but a temporary injunction cannot be granted after final judgment.[65]

By whom issued. Where a three judge court determines that a preliminary injunction should issue, as considered supra § 168, it is proper for the local district judge, acting alone, to issue the preliminary injunction prayed for.[66]

Issuance and service of summons or subpœna. While it has been held that the issuance of a temporary injunction without issuance of a summons is a mere irregularity, the writ becoming operative when the summons is issued,[67] ordinarily a temporary injunction cannot be granted before issuance of the summons or subpœna;[68] but the writ may be issued or the order signed prior to the service of the summons or subpœna,[69] in which case the injunction and process may be served together;[70] and although service of the writ or order before or without the service of the summons is irregular, the injunction is not rendered void but is binding until dissolved.[71]

a. In General

The order for an injunction need not be in any particular form, unless the form is prescribed by statute or rule of court.

In the absence of statutory directions no particular form is necessary,[73] and mere irregularities in the form of the order do not vitiate it.[74] The writ or order should show on its face that it was issued by proper authority.[75] In the absence of statute or rule of court it has been held that an order for the issuance of a preliminary injunction need not be signed by the judge, but the entry of the order, announced orally in open court, in the clerk's minute book makes the decision a matter of record.[76] Where an application for injunctive relief is heard by a three-judge court, as considered supra § 168, and it is determined by them that it is not a case calling for a three-judge court, the three judges, being in accord as to the findings and decree to be entered, may sign such findings and decree so that, in the event that it should thereafter be determined that the case was one for three judges, an appropriate decree will have been entered.[77]

Statutory provisions and rules of court. In form and content the writ or order should comply with statutory regulations[78] and rules of court.[79] Thus, when required by statute or rules of court, the order should recite the grounds or reasons for its issuance,[80] and the court must set forth the findings of fact and conclusions of law which constitute the grounds of its action,[81] although it has been held that a disregard of a statute requiring that the order shall set forth the reasons for its issuance does not render the order void.[82] When required by statute the order must be entered of record.[83]

b. Definiteness and Certainty

An injunction should be so clear and certain in its terms that defendant may readily know what he is restrained from doing.

It is impossible to lay down any precise rule of universal application as to the degree of certainty required,[84] further than the rule that an injunc-

Form of order

(1) The section of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, providing that every employer shall pay specified minimum wages, can be violated only by failure to discharge the affirmative duty created by the act, and violations can be enjoined only by ordering payment, and whether the injunction is couched as a double negative ("You are enjoined from failing to pay") or in affirmative mandatory language ("You are ordered to pay") is immaterial.—Fleming v. Alderman, D.C.Conn., 51 F.Supp. 800.

Particularity required in indictment

A court should enjoin only specific acts or types of acts with the particularity required in an indictment, and this rule should be applied, even though defendant has consented to the entry of judgment violating the rule.—Fleming v. Salem Box Co., D. C.Or., 38 F.Supp. 997.

Order that writ of injunction be issued "in all things as prayed for" in petition was unenforceable when read with petition, because order prohibited police officers from unlawfully interfering with lawful operation of restaurant, and did not define acts to be restrained.—Hopkins v. Frenchy, Tex.Civ.App., 75 S.W.2d 184.

87. Ga.—Patten v. Miller, 8 S.E.2d 786, 190 Ga. 152.

tain as to the acts prohibited without requiring any reference to the bill or other papers,[88] although there is authority to the effect that the bill may be looked to in order to aid an otherwise indefinite order;[89] and, indeed, it would seem that, where the injunction refers to the bill and defendant has knowledge of the contents of the bill, and the meaning of the injunction is obvious, he cannot insist that the injunction is too vague and uncertain.[90] An order granting a preliminary injunction, when clear and unambiguous, cannot be narrowed or broadened by the terms of the writ or supporting bond, but, where an order is doubtful or ambiguous, a consideration of the writ and bond may be permitted.[91]

d. Character and Extent of Restraint Granted

The restraint imposed must be reasonable and should go no further than is necessary to protect the plaintiff's rights.

In measuring the scope of the order or decree, the court will consider the nature and object of the bill, the property that requires protection, the interest of parties in that property, and will ascertain what order or decree is indispensable, in view of the respective rights of the parties, to afford complete protection.[92] An injunction, compliance with which is left largely to the discretion of defendant, cannot be upheld.[93]

Nevertheless, the restraint imposed must be reasonable;[94] should in no event go further than is absolutely necessary to protect or safeguard plaintiff's rights;[95] should be so framed as to injure defendant's rights as little as possible;[96] and should in no event be broader than that which is asked in the bill or complaint,[97] especially where the injunction is granted on an ex parte hearing;[98] but an injunction will be construed to be in accord with the allegations of the bill if the language used will

(1) The mere fact that a court has found that a defendant has committed an act in violation of a statute does not justify an injunction broadly to obey the statute and thus subject defendant to contempt proceedings if he shall at any time in the future commit some new violation unlike and unrelated to that with which he was originally charged.—National Labor Relations Board v. "And" as "or"
In construing an injunction order enjoining defendant from selling tea put up in packages like in shape or wrappers to the complainant's and from making use, in connection with the sale of tea, of the designation "Black Package Tea," the court said: "It is substantially admitted that the appellant violated the injunction by the use of packages and wrappers of the form enjoined; but, because he did not also put upon the packages the words 'Black Package Tea,' it is urged that he did not violate the injunction upon the ground that all these things must combine in order to constitute such violation. It is perfectly plain from a reading of the order that the word 'and' was used in a disjunctive and not in a conjunctive sense."—Fischer v. Blank, 31 N.Y.S. 10, 11, 81 Hun 579, affirmed 39 N.E. 857, 144 N.Y. 700.

Interlocutory or final decree
Chancellor's decree, ordering mandatory injunction in vacation without consent of parties, constituted only an interlocutory decree authorizing temporary injunction.—Morris v. Trussell, 109 So. 854, 144 Miss. 343.

Order as one denying application for temporary injunction
Order of trial court stating in part that an injunction would not lie restraining defendants from committing certain acts was construable as one overruling an application for a temporary injunction after fully hearing both pleading and evidence as against contention that order sustained a general demurrer to plaintiffs' application for writ of injunc-

allegations and prayer of the bill.[7] When several words are followed by a clause which is applicable as much to the first and other words as to the last, the clause must be read as applicable to all.[8]

Where disobedience of an injunction is a penal offense and punishable as such, the injunction, like penal and criminal statutes, should be construed strictly in favor of the person charged with violating it.[9]

Official judicial construction. It is improper for an attorney for a party in a suit for injunction to ask the judge unofficially to construe the order; the proper practice is to move for a judicial construction or a modification of it.[10]

b. Operation and Effect of Order

(1) In general
(2) On transfers or agreements in violation of injunction

(1) In General

A temporary injunction does not adjudicate the ultimate rights in controversy and ordinarily it remains in force until superseded by the final decree.

The presumption is that, where an injunction may have been regularly issued, it was so issued.[11] The order relates back to the date of the decision granting an injunction,[12] and, in the absence of a time limitation, a temporary injunction continues in force until dissolved or modified or until final judgment is entered,[13] but if the temporary injunction or the order therefor fixes a certain date for its expiration without the clause "or until the further order of the court" the injunction is no longer in force after the date specified unless it is extended or continued.[14] An injunction restraining the breach of a contract does not extend beyond the expiration of the agreement;[15] and a preliminary injunction against the enforcement of an ordinance on the ground that it was in violation of a contract, even though it is in terms to continue to final hearing, does not operate to extend the life of such contract in case it expires prior to the final hearing.[16]

An injunction is granted to protect or enforce existing rights or liens and does not create any new lien or give rise to any new substantive rights between the person to whom it is granted and the person enjoined,[17] although in some cases the writ tion, which, when facts were taken as true, clearly entitled them to relief sought.—Gibraltar Sav. & Bldg. Ass'n v. Isbell, Tex.Civ.App., 101 S.W.2d 1029.

Until further order of court to be held on certain date
A preliminary injunction restraining defendant "until the further order of the district court . . . to be holden at 10:00 o'clock A.M., Monday, Sept. 8, 1930," expired on the date fixed in the absence of an order continuing the restraint.—English v. Restoration of official to public office Where attorney for fourth-class town was discharged by mayor thereof before application for and issuance of injunctive order restraining town and its officials from interfering with attorney's performance of his duties pending final determination of his right to such office by court, such order did not restore him to office or entitle him to salary

has been held to create an equitable lien.[18] Various other consequences may flow from the granting or denial of an application for injunctive relief.[19]

Conclusiveness; res judicata. The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate rights in controversy,[20] is not conclusive on the court on a subsequent hearing,[21] and concludes no rights of the parties;[22] and this is so even after its affirmance on appeal from a decree dissolving it.[23] An order granting or denying a preliminary injunction merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending a trial on the merits, defendant should, or that he should not, be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him;[24] and when the cause is finally tried it may be found that the facts require a decision against the party prevailing on the preliminary application,[25] and the order may be modified in the final judgment giving to the respective parties that order or judgment which the rules of equity require.[26]

Persons bound or affected. The rights of persons not parties to the suit are not affected by an injunction,[27] although, as considered infra § 263, certain classes of persons, such as agents and servants, at-thereof as town's de facto attorney during such interim.—Warnock v. Town of Marysville, 136 P.2d 188, 17 Wash.2d 515.

18. Perpetual injunction against one's alienating his interest in certain property, as against plaintiff's claims on it, gives to plaintiff an equitable lien on that interest to the extent of those claims as against the parties to the suit in which the injunction issued.—Sheafe v. Sheafe, 40 N.H. 516.

19. Injunction on court's own motion after denial of temporary injunction

A trial court is without power in injunction proceeding, after denying temporary injunction and sustaining exception of no cause of action to petition, to issue of its own motion temporary injunction, since to do so would be in effect granting a suspensive appeal which is not permitted by statute from a judgment refusing an injunction.—Knott v. Himel, 179 So. 441, 189 La. 323.

(1) Injunction against purchase of school site by district board of trustees, resulting in selection of another site, and appeal therefrom, placed it within power of county board of education to make selection, under statute.—McCulley v. McFarland, 118 S.E. 52, 155 Ga. 700.

(2) Injunction restraining school district board of trustees from selecting particular site for schoolhouse, but not purporting to interfere with right of appeal, did not prevent county board of education from selecting such site on appeal from district board's selection of another site, especially as there may have been facts, such as ownership of the site, authorizing injunction against local board, and not against county board.—McCulley v. McFarland, supra.

Disregarding injunction against person improperly restrained

Fact that temporary injunction preserving status quo in controversy over office of superintendent of independent school district ran against municipality as well as board of trustees was harmless and would be disregarded as to the municipality, since management of schools was in

torneys, privies, aiders, and abettors, and persons adequately represented in the suit, may by their acts render themselves amenable to punishment as for a contempt of court.

Effect on actions at law. As considered supra § 50, an injunction restraining a person from commencing or further prosecuting an action at law does not operate as a prohibition to the law court in the exercise of its jurisdiction, but only prevents plaintiff therein from proceeding. However, it has been held that it is not competent for a court of law to dismiss a suit commenced in such court, and to enter up judgment for costs against a plaintiff on the ground that plaintiff has been perpetually enjoined in chancery from proceeding.[28] Before judgment in the suit at law it does not operate as a release of errors therein.[29]

(2) On Transfers or Agreements in Violation of Injunction

Transfers and agreements in violation of an injunction are invalid as to the complainant and those claiming under him, except as against innocent third persons.

Transfers and contracts or agreements in violation of an injunction are invalid as to complainant or those claiming under him, and may be set aside[30] except as against an innocent third person[31] or when it appears on final hearing that there was no ground for granting the injunction.[32]

However, it has been held that a conveyance made in violation of an injunction is not void or inoperative as to anyone except those for whose benefit the injunction was granted,[33] and not as to them where they consented to the making of the conveyance without the dissolution of the injunction.[34] A contract or conveyance in violation of an injunction is valid as against the party making it.[35]

Where a contract recognizes the validity of a temporary injunction and provides that the agreement is to take effect only on the contingency that such impediment will be removed, immediately on its removal the contract becomes valid and binding.[36]

§ 208. Service of Writ or Order and Return

a. In general
b. Mode of service and return
c. Technical defects and waiver

a. In General

Service of a copy of a temporary injunction ordinarily must be made on the person enjoined.

To make a temporary injunction effectual, it is generally necessary to serve a copy of the writ or restraining order on the person enjoined;[37] but it has been held that, if defendant is otherwise informed of the issuance of the injunction, he will be bound thereby as though it had actually been served.[38] It has been held that, where a defendant was personally served with the summons and complaint, it was not necessary to serve on him the judgment by default containing the injunction.[39]

39. Wash.—State v. McCoy, 209 P. 1112, 122 Wash. 94.

Time for service. The writ or order of injunction should be served within a reasonable time[40] and within the time prescribed by rule of court.[41]

b. Mode of Service and Return

In the absence of statutory regulations, to effect a regular service of a writ of injunction the writ itself must be shown to the defendant and a true copy delivered; but substituted service is proper where the defendant evades service or other circumstances render it necessary.

Independent of statutory provisions, to effect a regular service of a writ of injunction, the writ itself under the seal of the court must be shown to defendant, and a true copy delivered to him.[42] By statute in some jurisdictions service by delivery of a copy of the writ or order is sufficient and the original need not be shown,[43] unless perhaps in cases where the exhibition of the original is specially requested by defendant.[44] In some states the moving affidavits must also be served with the order,[45] and this requirement is not waived by an agreement between counsel made out of court that a hearing should be had at a certain time.[46]

Service on agent. While under proper circumstances service on an agent may be sufficient to bind the principal,[47] where defendant has been served it is not necessary to serve copies on his agent or employees.[48]

Service on attorney. Where defendants are all jointly interested, service of a copy of the writ or order on the attorney representing them is sufficient.[49]

Substituted service. In accordance with the practice obtaining in the particular jurisdiction, it has been held that, where defendant evades service or other circumstances render it necessary and proper, personal service of the order or writ on defendant may be dispensed with by order of the court,[50] and that service may be had by leaving a copy of the order, writ, or other necessary papers at the residence of defendant.[51] Constructive service, by publication, however, is not sufficient to make an injunction binding on a person who is a nonresident of the state.[52]

Return. Writs of injunction are usually returnable to the county in which the action is pending.[53] They must be returned within the time prescribed by rule of court.[54]

c. Technical Defects and Waiver

Mere technical defects in the service of the writ or order ordinarily are disregarded and the defendant by appearing and contesting the right to an injunction waives defects in the service.

The courts are inclined to disregard mere technical defects in the service of the writ or order.[55] The parties may by agreement waive personal service,[56] and defects in service may be waived by defendant appearing and contesting the right to an injunction.[57]

§ 209. Service of Process in Action

The service of a summons or subpœna as a prerequisite to the issuance of a preliminary injunction is discussed supra § 205 and as a prerequisite to the issuance of a restraining order infra § 210, while supra §§ 179, 180 is discussed the necessity of notice of an application for a restraining order or preliminary injunction and the necessity of service of a summons or subpœna as a condition to the grant of a final injunction.

A restraining order must comply with statutory requirements[58] and rules of court.[59] Under the procedure in some jurisdictions a restraining order may not be issued unless or until an action has been commenced in a proper case by the filing of a complaint, and then only at the time of issuing summons unless affidavits are filed afterward.[60] In other jurisdictions a subpœna is not required to be taken out with a restraining order.[61]

A restraining order should be so clear and certain in its terms that defendant may readily know what he is restrained from doing, and that he must obey it at his peril.[62] In the absence of a statutory requirement or rule of court, a restraining order is not void because it does not disclose on its face that a bond was required or the reason for its issuance,[63] but when required by statute or rule of court the restraining order must state the reasons for its issuance,[64] and define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice.[65] It has been held that a temporary restraining order granted pending a hearing may properly include all real parties in interest who are represented by defendant where the number of such parties is so great as to preclude their being made parties.[66]

Service and return. A restraining order must be made returnable in accordance with statutory regulations.[67]

§ 211. Final Judgment or Decree

a. In general
b. Form and contents

a. In General

A permanent injunction is properly granted only by a final decree rendered after a hearing on the merits or after the case has been matured and defendant has been afforded an opportunity for such hearing.

A permanent or perpetual injunction issues as a final judgment which settles the rights of the parties after the determination of all issues raised;[68] and the judgment granting it is clearly distinguishable from an order granting interlocutory injunctive relief.[69] It has been said that the entry of an order of injunction is in some respects analogous to the publication of a penal statute; it is a notice to the parties that certain things must be done or not done under a penalty to be fixed by the court.[70]

70. Ky.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v.

An injunction may be granted after a trial or hearing on the merits of the case[71] and a final decree granting or refusing an injunction should not be entered until after a hearing on the merits[72] where a verified answer containing denials is filed[73] or where no answer is required, or a rule to show cause is equivalent to an answer.[74] It has been said that a final decree may be entered without a hearing on the merits only when a demurrer to the bill has been interposed and overruled and defendant elects to stand by his demurrer.[75] As shown infra § 212, however, some authorities consider it proper to render a final decree where defendant fails to answer a bill stating a cause of action.

Whether a bill may be dismissed on granting a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction is discussed supra § 198.

Conditions on granting or refusing the injunction are discussed supra § 202.

b. Form and Contents

(1) In general
(2) Conformity to pleadings, evidence, and findings

(1) In General

A decree granting permanent injunctive relief should in clear, precise, and definite terms grant the plaintiff the relief to which he is entitled for the protection of his rights; but it should not be too broad in scope, as in respect of granting more relief than is necessary for the protection of plaintiff's rights or in enjoining activities of the defendant which are lawful and a proper exercise of his rights.

The court may, in its final decree in a suit for an injunction, grant such, and only such, permanent injunctive relief as, in view of the facts, circumstances, and situation in the particular case,[76] and the law applicable thereto,[77] is reasonable,[78] prop-

Case not matured for hearing
(1) Where a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction has been overruled and the case is not matured for hearing, the court cannot proceed to decree settling the principles of the case.—Fadely v. Tomlinson, 24 S.E. 645, 41 W.Va. 606.

(2) Where permanent injunction was granted before complainants' bill was entered on record and before defendants could answer and there were no affidavits or bond filed, decree was void.—Mintzer v. Turnbach, 172 A. 162, 113 Pa.Super. 113.

Interlocutory hearing
Final order requiring parties to vacate premises cannot be granted on interlocutory hearing.—Bond v. Harrison, 168 S.E. 604, 176 Ga. 568.

Where defendant has not been afforded day in court for determination in some proper way of the issues raised by the pleadings, it is error to grant a permanent injunction.—Galloway v. Stone, 182 S.E. 333, 208 N.C. 739.

Mandatory injunction
(1) In a state wherein by virtue of statute a mandatory injunction is not authorized, see supra § 5, a judgment granting a permanent injunction which is mandatory will be reversed.—Burns v. Hale, 133 S.E. 857, 162 Ga. 336.

(2) However, judgment, that salaries due deputy sheriffs be paid to them as was done before commissioners passed order abolishing offices and that commissioners be restrained from interfering with payment of deputy sheriffs' salaries, was held not erroneous as granting mandatory injunction, in view of relief sought.—Board of Com'rs of Richmond County v. be entitled, after trial, to a permanent injunction in a labor dispute notwithstanding his failure to comply with a statute relating to injunctions in labor disputes where the statute was enacted after the bringing of the action and is applicable only to the granting of ex parte and temporary injunctions, as distinguished from permanent injunctions.[95]

Provision as to penalty for disobedience. Usually no provision is inserted in the decree granting an injunction for the payment of a pecuniary penalty for its violation.[96]

A provision for modification, or retention of jurisdiction for this purpose, in the event of a change in conditions may,[97] but need not,[98] be inserted in a decree granting a perpetual injunction.

Time of restraint. It may be proper, in view of the facts of the particular case, to provide in a decree granting an injunction that the injunction shall not become effective until a certain future date,[99] or that it shall cover the entire term fixed by a restrictive covenant,[1] or that it shall continue only while a certain status or situation remains unchanged[2] or until a certain result is obtained.[3] An injunction is not objectionable as being without a time limit where the reasonable interpretation thereof is that it shall be operative only while a certain relation exists.[4]

Definiteness. A decree granting a permanent injunction should be as definite, clear, and precise in its terms as possible,[5] and when practicable it should plainly inform defendant of all of the acts which he is restrained from doing,[6] or is commanded to do,[7] without calling on him for inferences or conclusions about which persons might well differ,[8] and without leaving anything for further hearing and decision.[9]

Decree denying relief. It may be proper, under the facts of the particular case, to refuse permanent injunctive relief[10] without prejudice to recovery in an action at law[11] or the commencement of another suit for the protection of plaintiff's rights by injunction or otherwise if it appears in the future that such rights are being violated.[12]

(2) Conformity to Pleadings, Evidence, and Findings

The final decree in a suit wherein injunctive relief is sought may and should be based on, and not go beyond, the pleadings, evidence, and findings supported by the evidence.

It is error to decree a permanent injunction for which there is no warrant in the pleadings.[13] The injunction must be based on the allegations of the bill[14] or cross bill, as discussed infra § 216, a permanent injunction in plaintiff's favor ordinarily not being justifiable, unless the bill or petition therefor sets out facts that are a sufficient basis for granting the relief asked.[15] So also as a general rule an injunction can be granted only where a prayer for relief by injunction is contained in the bill, discussed supra § 182, or answer, discussed supra § 183. When relief by injunction is prayed for, the injunction should be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings[16] and should not be allowed in broader terms than prayed for in the bill.[17] It has been held, however, that a judgment is not necessarily erroneous for exceeding plaintiff's pleadings, where the matter on which it is rendered is pleaded by defendant, and plaintiff's prayer for relief is sufficiently broad to cover that awarded.[18] Also the court may impose a condition on the granting of a permanent injunction to plaintiff, as already discussed supra § 202 notwithstanding it is not asserted or demanded by answer or cross bill.[19] A motion for a permanent injunction is not necessary where the prayer of the petition is sufficient to bring the matter to the attention of the court.[20] Where such a motion is made it will be considered as a motion for final judgment.[21]

An injunction should be warranted by the proofs in the case[22] and not go further than such proofs require.[23] It should not forbid the doing of acts which are not shown by the evidence to have been committed or threatened to be committed.[24]

The decree may and should be based on, and conform to, findings[25] which are supported by the evidence[26] and are not plainly erroneous.[27]

§ 212. —— By Default

A final decree may be entered where a bill states a good cause of action for an injunction and the defendant, after being duly served, defaults in pleading.

Ordinarily a final decree may be entered against defendant in an injunction suit where, after being duly served, he fails to answer and the bill states a good cause of action;[28] but, under statute, it is not error for the court to take evidence on defendant's failure to answer;[29] and in some states ordinarily an order for proofs is made when a decree is taken pro confesso against defendant.[30]

§ 213. —— Effect of Granting or Denying Temporary Injunction

Injunctive relief is granted on final hearing irrespective of whether or not a preliminary injunction was sought or granted; but, in a proper case, the court may so frame its final decree as to make a temporary injunction permanent.

The fact that a preliminary injunction was granted or continued should not influence the court on final hearing, but the relief granted should be in accordance with the rights as they then appear.[31] This is also true in case the preliminary injunction was denied[32] or was dissolved, as discussed infra § 255, and the court may on final hearing grant a perpetual injunction, although no temporary injunction was sought before such hearing.[33] So the decree may afford complete relief as to injuries that have been consummated since the suit was begun,[34] for, even though no temporary injunction was obtained, defendant acts at his peril in doing pendente lite the acts sought to be enjoined.[35] A permanent injunction may properly be granted on a trial of the merits although the affidavit for a temporary injunction was defective or no bond for the temporary injunction was given.[36] Unless defendant defaults in pleading,[37] it is improper to render a final decree granting a perpetual injunction on the basis of the evidence produced on the hearing of an application for a preliminary injunction.[38]

In suit to enforce building restriction, judgment finding that plaintiffs were entitled to relief as prayed was not erroneous in that there was no finding that building in question constituted violation of restriction, as, necessarily, if plaintiffs were entitled to the relief sought in their petition, defendant must have been found, on the facts, to have violated the restriction.—Frank v. Provided such action is proper under the facts[39] and proceedings[40] in the case, the court may, in its final decree, make a temporary injunction permanent,[41] continue it in effect until final termination of the suit if an appeal is filed or until expiration of the time allowed for appeal from the final decree if no appeal is taken,[42] provide for its modification,[43] or dissolve it in part and perpetuate it in part.[44]

A decree granting a permanent injunction should be rendered only against known persons or suable entities who have the requisite connection with the subject matter of the suit and are parties or agents, associates, or confederates of parties.

A permanent injunction should not be granted by final decree against persons improperly made parties and dismissed from the suit,[45] or against persons not made parties and not in court,[46] unless they are legally identified with a party and privy to his performance of the prohibited act,[47] such as

Facts at particular time

(1) It has been held that right to have temporary injunction made permanent is to be determined by status existing at time of commencement of suit and issuance of temporary injunction.—Herrmann v. Kaiser, Mo. App., 85 S.W.2d 928.

(2) It has also been held, however, that after the cause for an injunction has been removed, equity will not make perpetual a temporary injunction theretofore properly granted.—Wiswell v. Cincinnati First Congregational Church, 14 Ohio St. 31.

(3) The decree may provide for a modification of a preliminary injunction granted in the cause when changed conditions require it.—Holloway v. Peoples Water Co., 167 P. 265, 100 Kan. 414, 2 A.L.R. 161—32 C.J. p 379 note 8.

Lack of right to other equitable relief

In action in which plaintiff's right to injunction depended on his right to other equitable relief sought, and he was properly adjudged not entitled to such other relief, he was not entitled to have temporary injunction continued or made permanent.—Herrmann v. Kaiser, Mo.App., 85 S.W.2d 928.

40. Where no preliminary injunction was formally issued, judgment decreeing that writ of injunction sued out be perpetuated was insufficient to serve as one.—Austin v. Currie, 134 So. 723, 16 La.App. 375.

Final hearing

(1) If a preliminary injunction, although granted on an insufficient bill, has been allowed to stand until final hearing, it may be perpetuated if the showing then made is sufficient. —Smith v. Blake, 55 N.W. 978, 96 Mich. 542.

(2) On final hearing in which applicant sought to perpetuate temporary injunction, applicant had burden of proving his case, and court could not take matters set out in the petition as confessed, where defendant has filed an answer containing a general denial, although not sworn to.—Cruse v. Mann, Tex.Civ.App., 74 S.W.2d 545, error dismissed.

Cause not regularly matured for final hearing

A decree perpetuating a temporary injunction before the cause has been regularly matured for final hearing on the proper proof of the material facts alleged as a basis for such final relief will be reversed on appeal.—Conley v. Brewer, 102 S.E. 607, 85 W.Va. 725.

On preliminary hearing of motion to dissolve temporary injunction, it was error to make injunction permanent, proper procedure being to dissolve or refuse to dissolve.—Mills v. Moore, Tex.Civ.App., 5 S.W.2d 263.

Return to order to show cause

Where return to order to show cause why temporary injunction should not be made permanent raised issue of fact determinable only by testimony, it was error for court to hold the return sufficient, to refuse to permit traverse of issues, and to dismiss rule.—Evans v. Town of Edgefield, 129 S.E. 207, 132 S.C. 380.

Demurrer to sufficient bill

Where the facts alleged in the bill were sufficient to entitle complainant to the injunctive relief sought and were admitted by demurrer, a temporary injunction was properly made permanent.—Penkala v. Tomczyk, 148 N.E. 64, 317 Ill. 356.

Answer removed from files

Perpetuating injunction where defendant had filed answer, but taken it from courthouse without calling court's attention to it, was proper.—National Bank of Hopewell, Va., v. Marshall, Tex.Civ.App., 2 S.W.2d 471, error dismissed.

No answer filed and case not docketed

The court is without jurisdiction to hear an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be made permanent where, at the time, no answer has been made to the summons and complaint and the cause has not been docketed.—Evans v. Town of Edgefield, 129 S.E. 207, 132 S.C. 380.

Injunction attempting to restrain all persons to whom notice thereof should come from doing certain things was erroneous as to persons not agents of, or associated with sole defendant.—Chase Nat. officers, agents, employees,[48] associates, or confederates[49] of such party. Also a judgment is null and void in so far as it grants a permanent injunction against voluntary organizations which are not suable entities and their unknown officers, members, agents, sympathizers, and confederates.[50] Within these limitations, the propriety of imposing a permanent injunctive restraint, which is otherwise appropriate, on a particular individual or corporation depends on his or its relation to the subject matter of the suit.[51] A defendant may be enjoined even though others who are not made parties are participating in the wrongful act causing the injury to complainant;[52] and the fact that the injunction cannot be granted against some of defendants ordinarily,[53] but not universally,[54] does not preclude granting it against others who have been properly summoned. A decree is properly rendered against all of several joint wrongdoers jointly sued.[55]

The persons who may be restrained in general are considered supra § 34.

§ 215. —— Construction, Operation, and Effect in General

General rules govern the construction and conclusiveness of a final decree granting or refusing injunctive relief. After a final decree granting an injunction the suit continues for purposes of review, enforcement, vacation, or modification of the decree, but is at an end for other purposes.

Rules applicable generally to construction of decrees in equity apply in the cases of final decrees awarding or refusing relief by injunction.[56] Also the general principles applicable in respect of the conclusiveness of judgments and decrees generally apply in the cases of final decrees awarding or refusing injunctions.[57] A decree for a perpetual injunction operates as a final adjudication which stays the acts threatened;[58] but it does not prevent[59] or require[60] acts which are not within its terms as reasonably construed. Regardless of whether it was properly or erroneously issued, the decree, if not absolutely void and if rendered by a court having full jurisdiction of the cause, the questions presented, and the parties, is binding[61] and must stand[62] and be obeyed,[63] in spirit, as well as literally,[64] until it is vacated or modified by valid orders in the cause, and it continues in operation until it is so vacated or modified,[65] unless the time it is to remain in force is otherwise fixed by the decree[66] or by a statute in effect at the time of the rendition of the decree.[67] In some respects the final decree closes and puts an end to the suit[68] where no trust is involved;[69] and it is not permissible thereafter to engraft on the suit proceedings other than those for review, enforcement, vacation, or modification,[70] nor should the court attempt to retain jurisdiction for the purpose of interpreting and construing the decree or determining in the original case grounds for another action which may arise in the future.[71] However, the final decree is said to continue the life of the equity proceeding for such other relief as the court may in good conscience grant under the law;[72] it is executory[73] and operates only prospectively[74] on present conditions;[75] and it creates no vested right, as discussed in Constitutional Law § 625 b, a vacation or modification thereof, on a showing of a change of circumstances rendering such action just and equitable, being permissible, as discussed infra § 218.

The finality of a judgment for defendant is not affected by the filing of a motion to assess damages on the bond for a temporary injunction.[76]

The termination of the effectiveness of an order for a preliminary injunction by the final decree is discussed infra § 244.

§ 216. —— Relief to Defendant or Intervenor

Direct and affirmative relief may be granted to defendant where he asserts a claim therefor in his answer or cross bill and shows himself entitled thereto.

Not only may equity grant relief indirectly to defendant by issuing an injunction against him on a condition to be performed by complainant, as discussed supra § 202 b, but it is proper to grant him direct relief and make complete final disposition of the entire controversy.[77] When he shows himself entitled to such relief, defendant may be granted an injunction against complainant,[78] or may be awarded damages,[79] or may be granted a decree for damages or in the alternative for specific performance,[80] or may be granted a decree for the cancellation of a contract[81] or deed,[82] or may be granted a decree vesting in him the title to,[83] or an easement over,[84] the land on which it is claimed he is trespassing, or may be granted a decree establishing a disputed boundary line in his favor.[85] While ordinarily equity will not compel a transfer of possession in favor of defendant,[86] yet, where defendant has been erroneously dispossessed of land as the result of a temporary injunction granted plaintiff, defendant should be restored to possession by the final decree.[87] Where complainant fails to make out his case, the bond given to stay an action at law may be ordered delivered to the person entitled for prosecution.[88]

Necessity of pleading claim for relief. In the absence of statute providing otherwise,[89] affirmative relief generally will not be granted, except on defendant's cross bill or counterclaim and prayer therefor,[90] or on answer praying for such relief,[91]

Facts alleged in plea admitted by replication
In action on notes, where defendant interposed equitable plea, alleging, among other things, that maker thereof was of unsound mind at time of making of notes, and that plaintiffs had so alleged in another suit, and asking injunction, and replication admitted such facts and did not sufficiently avoid them, action at law on such notes will be enjoined.

but a limitation of the rule is recognized when one seeks to be relieved of a forfeiture.[92] Where defendant's rights are set forth and admitted by plaintiff in his bill, it is sufficient for defendant to ask in his answer for the judgment to which he is entitled on plaintiff's own accounting.[93]

An intervenor is not entitled to a decree that he holds title in fee, even though his showing justifies a dismissal of complainant's bill.[94] In a patent infringement suit, the court, on holding the patent invalid and not infringed, may grant an injunction against infringement suits by plaintiff against any of the customers of an intervenor.[95]

§ 217. —— Additional, Alternative or Incidental Relief

a. In general
b. Damages or security therefor

a. In General

Other relief is granted or refused in a suit for an injunction in accordance with the pleadings and facts in the particular case and the application thereto of general rules of equity jurisprudence.

Under the general rule as to the retention of jurisdiction for the purpose of affording full relief by a court of equity which has obtained jurisdiction of a controversy on any ground, or for any purpose, as considered in Equity § 67, a court of equity which has acquired jurisdiction of a suit for a permanent injunction may, in such suit, grant such other or further appropriate relief as it may see fit,[96] including a decree for an accounting,[97] a judgment or decree for money due,[98] an order or decree for the return or restoration of property[99] or payment of its value,[1] or an order that an instrument, the prosecution of a suit on which is enjoined, be delivered up for cancellation.[2] Where the court has jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of future injuries it may in a proper case prevent by mandatory injunction a continuing injury from acts already committed.[3]

However, other relief should not be granted prematurely[4] or without having acquired jurisdiction of a necessary party;[5] where plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, the court is not authorized to accept in lieu thereof defendant's promise to desist from the acts in question;[6] under the facts of the particular case, and the law applicable thereto, the court may be without authority to create a lien[7] or to cancel a note constituting an existing obligation,[8] a bond on which liability may have accrued,[9] or a mortgage constituting a lien;[10] and, when enjoining the prosecution of an action at law or the execution of an order of sale, a court of equity should not attempt in its decree to nullify the order of the court of law or to direct that certain further steps be taken in the action at law.[11] That part of an injunctive decree which releases complainant from custody is erroneous where he has been released on his own recognizance.[12] Where a state statute grants the right to sue the state on certain contracts in a particular state court, a federal court cannot render a judgment against the state for money owing to complainant under such contracts.[13]

Where title is in issue, the court may settle the question of title[14] and order the execution of a deed,[15] or it may frame an issue of title and send such issue to a court of law to be tried or so frame its order granting the injunction as to compel the parties themselves to institute such an action.[16]

Where injunction denied. Except where some equitable ground appears for retaining jurisdiction,[17] on refusing an injunction the court ordinarily will not retain the case for the granting of other relief.[18] It is error to render a judgment refusing injunctive relief against the prosecution of other actions and in effect retaining the suit in so far as it sets up defenses, set-offs, or counterclaims to the suits brought by some of the defendants, where other defendants, properly joined in the present action, have brought suits involving similar or related questions.[19] Where an injunction is not authorized, no alternative relief can be granted which is inconsistent with the relief prayed for in the bill[20] or which is beyond the recognized powers of a court of equity to grant;[21] and, where an injunction is the only relief demanded and an injunction is denied, the court cannot retain the bill for the purpose of granting alternative relief without an amendment of the bill;[22] but, where the demand for an injunction is only incidental and not the main purpose or object of the suit, the suit is not abated in case of circumstances arising which would make the granting of the injunction unnecessary;[23] and, even where the suit is for an injunction and incidental relief, the removal during the pendency of the suit of the grounds for injunctive relief does not take away jurisdiction or bar the court from granting incidental relief, if the pleadings disclose a proper case for injunctive relief when the suit was instituted and the proof on the final hearing warrants the incidental relief.[24] Where suit is brought in a court of law for an injunction under a statute conferring jurisdiction on such court only in a designated class of cases, and the court denies relief by injunction, it is without power to retain jurisdiction of the case as a chancery court and award other equitable relief.[25]

Inability of court to grant complete injunctive relief to a judgment debtor is not inconsistent with a power to determine issues and exercise jurisdiction to afford less extensive relief in proceedings rightly before it.[26]

Where an injunction was improperly granted, to restrain proceedings at law, it cannot be made the pretext for retaining a bill for specific performance.[27] Under a proper pleading, however, plaintiff may have a decree and execution for a debt, notwithstanding an injunction was the main purpose of the suit and was improperly granted.[28]

After dissolution and resumption of jurisdiction by court of law, in the case of an injunction restraining a suit at law, the court of equity should not retain the case for the purpose of awarding other relief. The injunction having been dissolved, the jurisdiction of the court of equity over all questions involved in the suit at law ceases.[29]

b. Damages or Security Therefor

(1) In general
(2) Where injunction denied
(3) Where injunction granted or withheld conditionally

(1) In General

It is proper to award in one suit an injunction against future acts and damages for injuries from past acts; but it is otherwise as to an injunction and an award of full compensation for all injuries, past and future.

Subject to certain exceptions and limitations, a court of equity which has taken jurisdiction of a suit for an injunction may, in doing complete justice between the parties in respect of the subject matter, award damages for an actionable injury which has been sustained.[30] In order to avoid a multiplicity of suits, and to dispose of the entire matter at once, equity may, in addition to an injunction, decree that defendant pay damages to complainants for all past injury,[31] and in addition to this the court may even render a decree for damages for injury that has occurred since the commencement of the suit, and up to the time of the trial and disposition of the case.[32] However, the rule that a court of equity may assess damages in an injunction proceeding is not mandatory.[33] It does not require plaintiff to ask for damages in the chancery suit, but he may still sue at law for damages;[34] and he will not be permitted to claim damages in the injunction suit where there is already an action at law pending for such damages, the proper course for him to pursue in these circumstances being to abandon the suit at law and give the court of equity control of the whole case.[35] Judgments in injunction suits for damages arising from wrongful issuance of injunction are discussed infra §§ 288, 289.

The making of a particular award of damages is contingent on a proper basis therefor in the pleadings[36] and evidence,[37] and likewise, on a proper ba-

Attorney's fee
In state where counsel fees may be awarded as compensatory damages if facts warrant infliction of exemplary damages, see Damages § 50 b, court, although awarding mandatory injunction, is not authorized to include compensation for plaintiff's attorney in damages assessed, in absence of evidence warranting allowance of punitive or exemplary damages.—New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Grodek, 186 N.E. 733, 127 Ohio St. 22, 89 A.L.R. 1091.
Matters excusing nonproduction of evidence at trial
Where, in a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with plaintiff's pipe lines across lands claimed by

sis therefor in the findings.[38] Plaintiff may be held entitled to an injunction and nominal damages;[39] and, where there is no proof of actual damages, only nominal damages may be awarded on granting the injunction.[40] Damages will not be awarded against merely nominal parties,[41] or against parties other than those liable to plaintiff therefor;[42] but they may be awarded against all defendants who, by reason of participation in a tort, are liable therefor.[43]

Statutory damages. Without express statutory authority, treble damages are not recoverable in a suit for injunctive relief[44] nor can damages without triplication be assessed by a jury summoned by the chancellor where the statute authorizing recovery of damages for violation thereof contemplates recovery only in a common-law action.[45]

Full compensation for past and future injuries. Plaintiff in an injunction suit is entitled to no more than complete relief consisting of an injunction against future injury and damages for past injury;[46] and it would be unjust and inconsistent to award him both an injunction to prevent an act and full damages arising from a consummation of the act[47] or an injunction against a future act and full compensation, by way of liquidated damages or otherwise, for all loss, including that which has occurred and that which may follow in the future.[48]

(2) Where Injunction Denied

According to the weight of modern authority, a court denying the injunctive relief sought may retain the case for the purpose of awarding damages to the plaintiff, especially where the injunction is rendered unnecessary by facts occurring after the bringing of the suit or it is refused on practical considerations.

In respect of the power of courts to award damages in the same suit where the right to injunction is denied, there is lack of harmony in the decisions, even in the same jurisdictions. Notwithstanding some decisions to the contrary,[49] the rule announced in a number of decisions is that, where a court has acquired jurisdiction of a suit for injunction in which the equitable relief sought is refused, it may in order to do complete justice in the premises retain the case for the purpose of awarding damages instead of remitting plaintiff to a separate action defendant under a tax sale, it could not be known until final decree whether defendant could be held liable for damage or expense or, if he could, to what extent, the fact that plaintiff produced no evidence at the trial to show how much it had been injured did not waive its right to a money decree.—Tide-Water Pipe Co. v. Loss of customers

It would be unjust to award plaintiff full compensation for permanent loss, or transfer to defendant, of certain customers and also restrain defendant permanently from making sales to such customers.—Whiting Milk Cos. v. Grondin, 184 N.E. 379, 282 Mass. 41.

(1) Lessor cannot recover as damages full value of trees wrongfully worked for turpentine purposes and enjoin lessee from working same.—Bainbridge Farm Co. v. Ball & Reynolds, 141 S.E. 647, 165 Ga. 582.

(2) In suit to enjoin adjoining owner from maintaining any part of a wall or garage on the plaintiff's land, to compel him to restore a former wall and for damages, damages for encroachment should have been based on the theory of temporary trespass and not on the theory of full compensation for land seized unless plaintiff sought damages for permanent occupation by such of defendants' structures as were not ordered to be removed.—McCarthy v. Lane, 16 N.E.2d 683, 301 Mass. 125.

therefor.[50] This rule is especially applicable in states where, under the statutes, there is only one form of civil action and various kinds of relief can be administered in the same action[51] or where the court is under a statutory duty to disregard a mistaken prayer for relief and to administer the proper relief if it has jurisdiction on any statements of facts properly pleaded and proved.[52] Where there is no ground for equity jurisdiction and also no actual damage, there is no foundation for a judgment for damages.[53] Where suit is brought to enjoin an injury which is merely threatened and an injunction is denied, the court has no power to award damages.[54]

Change in circumstances pendente lite. Where the bill or complaint states sufficient grounds for injunction, but by reason of facts occurring after suit brought, the right to an injunction does not exist at the time of the trial, the court, even though denying the injunction, will retain the cause and award damages,[55] and that, too, although there may be an adequate remedy at law.[56] This rule is, of course, especially applicable where at the time of bringing suit complainant was entitled to equitable relief and defendant hastened the injurious acts complained of to completion before the hearing.[57] The rule has been applied also where by reason of lapse of time injunction has become improper,[58] where by reason of changed conditions at the time of the trial the right sought to be protected by injunction was of very little present value,[59] or where at the time of the trial the acts complained of had ceased.[60]

Damages in lieu of injunction. The court may, under the exigencies of the case, deny the injunctive relief prayed for and award damages in lieu thereof,[61] as where the equity of the bill is established, but an injunction appears impracticable or unjust,[62] or defendant has acted in good faith,[63] or an injunction is refused because it would be of

Whether the case shall be retained for the purpose of awarding damages on denying the equitable relief is a matter within the sound discretion of the court.

Acts of parties in suit

(1) Court, if denying mandatory injunction sought, was entitled to award damages where both parties submitted case on theory that court might find damages, if any, if equitable relief were denied.—Mary Jane Stevens Co. v. First Nat. Bldg. Co., 57 P.2d 1099, 89 Utah 456.

(2) Notwithstanding the refusal of the court to award an injunction, it may, nevertheless, retain the case and award damages where defendant does not insist on his defense that there is an adequate remedy at law, but on the contrary submits himself and his rights solely to the equitable jurisdiction of the court and in addition thereto demands affirmative relief.—Crocker v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co., 70 N.Y.S. 492, 61 App.Div. 226.

Damages in issue

Damages were properly awarded plaintiff, denied injunction prayed in complaint also asking other proper relief, where question of damages was put in issue by pleadings and evidence.—McRae v. Lois Grunow Memorial Clinic, 14 P.2d 478, 40 Ariz. 496.

Grounds for refusing injunction

(1) Delay in asserting right by one whose land is encroached upon will not bar all relief, but equity, although declining to remove trespasser, will award damages.—Soifer v. Stein, 101 Pa.Super. 135.

(2) Where plaintiff has been denied equitable relief by way of mandatory injunction because of laches and the balancing of equities, jurisdiction will be retained for the purpose of assessing compensatory damages.—Foley v. School Dist. of City of Connellsville, Pa.Com.Pl., 2 Fay.L.J. 205.

Transfer to law side

In Kentucky it has been held that, under the civil code of practice, where the court in its discretion refuses an injunction, it should not dismiss the petition absolutely, but should transfer the action to law and permit an amendment to the pleadings setting up a cause of action for damages.—McHugh v. Louisville Bridge Co., 65 S.W. 456, 23 Ky.L. 1546.

little benefit to complainant and its enforcement would inflict great injury on defendant or the public, or both.[64] There may, however, be nothing in the circumstances of a particular case that would warrant the court in confining relief to the payment of damages;[65] and where equitable principles clearly entitle complainant to an injunction, even though his damage is small in amount, it is error to decree damages in lieu of the injunction asked.[66]

(3) Where Injunction Granted or Withheld Conditionally

The court may make payment, or the giving of security for payment, of ascertained damages a condition of withholding an injunction, or it may grant an injunction on condition that it be dissolved on the giving of a bond by the defendant to pay damages assessed against him.

The court may ascertain the damages and provide for withholding or issuing an injunction accordingly as defendant pays or fails to pay such damages.[67] This course may be pursued where, by reason of acquiescence or other acts on the part of complainants, relief by injunction would be inequitable,[68] or where an inequitable result would follow the granting of a permanent injunction,[69] or where the allowance of an injunction would be of small benefit to plaintiff and would inflict great injury on defendant.[70]

The deposit of adequate security for the payment of damages may be made a condition of withholding the issuance of an injunction.[71] Also the court may grant an injunction conditioned to be dissolved on the giving of a sufficient bond by defendant to pay all damages that may be assessed against him.[72]

§ 218. —— Opening and Vacating or Modifying

The court which rendered a final decree granting a permanent injunction may, on motion and a showing of facts making it equitable to do so, open and vacate or modify such decree; and, according to the weight of authority, it may do so after the expiration of the term at which the decree was rendered.

Damages for permanent injuries from trespass
A court may award damages for permanent injuries to property caused by trespass only where trespasser has power to acquire legal title to property trespassed upon and trespasser concedes that such trespass is to continue permanently. In making such award equity court merely finds amount of damages which owner will sustain if trespass continues permanently and trespasser may then elect to pay such damages or to discontinue the trespass, whereupon the court will enjoin any future trespass.—Sound Marine & Machine Corporation v. Consent decree
The inherent powers of an equity court permit it to modify consent decree granting injunction if circumstances which have arisen since the entry of decree make it an "instrument of wrong" and a decree is an instrument of wrong if because of the change in circumstances the moving parties are the "victims of oppression," that is, if the hardships they are suffering because of changed circumstances are so extreme and unexpected that when balanced against substantial dangers which injunction was designed to protect, equity and good conscience require a modification.—Fleming v. Excusable default Default and resulting perpetual injunction may be set aside on motion supported by answer stating complete defense and showing default was excusable.—Ak-Sar-Ben Exposition Co. v. Sorensen, 229 N.W. 13, 119 Neb. 358.

Failure of complaint to state cause of action Setting aside default in suit to enjoin issuance of warrants was not meaning of the papers served on him;[86] or where defendant's consent to the decree was given through mistake and in ignorance of his obligations to other persons whose interests would be prejudiced thereby.[87] However, a final decree awarding an injunction will not be opened except on good cause shown;[88] and a modifying order itself should be set aside where the exercise of a right under the order resulted in the use of violence and intimidation.[89]

Modification on appeal from the decree in an injunction suit is discussed in Appeal and Error § 1883 d. Continuing, dissolving, discharging or modifying preliminary injunctions is considered infra §§ 224–256.

Time. It has been held that the decree may be vacated or modified after the term at which it was rendered,[90] and at any time[91] when the cause on which it was granted had been removed and the danger of invading plaintiff's right no longer exists.[92] According to other authorities, however, such action is not permissible after the expiration of the term[93] where the court had jurisdiction to render the decree.[94] Also it has been held that, where a permanent injunction is valid on its face, the court has no jurisdiction more than a year later to modify it by striking from its provisions all reference to certain parties who were properly before the court.[95]

Procedure. A motion to modify or vacate a decree granting a permanent injunction is a proper remedy.[96] Such remedy is not barred by the availability of other remedies, such as defense of a contempt proceeding, certiorari, or habeas corpus to obtain relief from a contempt commitment, or an independent action in equity.[97] Also the filing of an additional bond in an appellate court for continuing a preliminary injunction does not estop plaintiff to move thereafter in the lower court to vacate a decree dismissing his bill.[98] Evidence heard in a contempt proceeding should, on proper application, be considered where the parties and the issues are the same and the same judge is to pass on the issues;[99] but a question tried and determined in the original action cannot be relitigated on a motion to modify or vacate.[1]

Supplementary injunction. The object of a supplementary injunction is not to amplify the original injunction, but rather is to specify and to apply the original injunction to actions and objects nonexistent when the case was decided. The inquiry is whether acts and things that have come into existence since the decree would have been enjoined by that decree had they then existed.[2] In one federal circuit, however, the procedure of employing a supplemental decree for the purpose of expanding the decree so as to make it cover new post-decree practices is not recognized; and it has been held that after the passing of the term the court is without jurisdiction of a motion for a supplemental decree where the motion is made for the purpose of reconstructing the decree and thereby procuring a new decree.[3]

§ 219. —— Stay or Suspension

Either in the decree granting an injunction, or in a subsequent order, the court may stay or suspend the operation of the injunction; but it will not do so unless a necessity for the stay or suspension is made to appear clearly.

The court may in its discretion suspend the operation of an injunction[4] or restraining order.[5] It may in the decree itself provide that the operation of the injunction shall be stayed for a certain length of time or until the happening of a condition;[6] and where an order staying the injunction is made after entry of the decree it becomes in effect a part thereof and operates concurrently therewith.[7] It is within the discretion of the court to stay the operation of the decree pending an appeal therefrom, until the hearing of the appeal on the merits;[8] but taking an appeal does not of itself operate as a stay.[9] After one stay or suspension it is within the power of the court to extend it further or to grant a second suspension;[10] but in no case will a stay or suspension be allowed unless a necessity therefor is clearly made to appear.[11] Where no substantial injury is shown to have resulted from the act complained of, although a technical right has been invaded, the decree entered should deny the injunction with leave at the foot of the decree to apply for an injunction at any time on showing substantial injury and that justice requires the relief.[12]

Time for application for stay. The application for a stay must be made with due diligence or it will not be considered.[13] Sometimes leave of court is granted to defendant to apply for a stay after the decree.[14]

Imposition of conditions. The court may impose conditions to the suspension of an injunction that will properly protect complainant,[15] such as a condition that defendant give a bond to pay all damages to be caused complainant by reason of the suspension.[16] junction suit or a party thereto as to be bound by the final decree thereof, of which he has knowledge, even though he is not formally and specifically named a party to the suit.

Generally an injunction binds only those persons who are parties to the suit[17] and are named in the decree;[18] and a statute limiting the binding effect of an injunction to parties to the suit is merely declaratory of the common law.[19] However, the term "parties to the suit," as used in such a statute, includes persons who, although not formally defendants, assume defense of the suit openly and to plaintiff's knowledge;[20] an injunction against a corporation binds both the corporate entity and all persons who act for the corporation in the transaction of its business and have knowledge of the decree;[21] and an injunction may bind all officers and members of a union, at least as soon as they have knowledge of it.[22] Also it is held that a shopper's league having knowledge of the submission to the court of a labor dispute between employer and employees is bound by the injunction granted in the suit.[23] The sureties on an injunction bond assume such a connection with the suit that they are concluded by the decree.[24]

As between defendants, a final decree refusing an injunction is not res judicata of the questions involved where it does not appear that their interests were adverse.[25]

§ 221. Costs

Although usually made to the successful party, the allowance of costs in an injunction suit is within the discretion of the court, as in other equitable suits, except where the matter is specially regulated by statute; and considerable variation in allowances is found, due to the circumstances of particular cases and the varying degrees of success of particular parties.

The general rule that the allowance of costs in equitable actions is within the discretion of the court, as discussed in Costs § 10 a, is applicable in suits for injunction,[26] except in so far as the question of costs may be subject to special statutory regulation.[27] Costs on dissolution of injunction are considered infra § 254.

In favor of complainant against defendant. A complainant who on final hearing is decreed a perpetual injunction according to his prayer usually is entitled to costs;[28] where a bill is brought for discovery as well as an injunction, if plaintiff succeeds in part he may be awarded costs;[29] and, where plaintiff is in the main successful on his motion for a temporary injunction, defendant may be held liable for the fees of a referee and stenographer incurred on the hearing of the motion.[30] On the other hand, complainant, when unsuccessful, is not entitled to an allowance of costs;[31] and even when he is successful, costs are refused him under some circumstances, as where the action enjoined was undertaken by defendant through the fault of complainant.[32] A party suing to enjoin the foreclosure of a mortgage who does not offer to do equity should not be awarded costs in either court, although he succeeds in getting a reduction of the amount of the mortgage.[33]

In favor of defendant against complainant. In case relief by injunction is denied on the final hearing, complainant must in general pay costs of the suit,[34] although damages are awarded to him[35] or a temporary injunction was obtained;[36] but sometimes no costs are allowed defendant in view of his motive to injure plaintiff.[37] On the other hand, it is error to tax costs against plaintiff where he brought the action in good faith and was entirely successful after being compelled by defendant to go to trial;[38] and even though a temporary injunction is perpetuated only in part, it may be error to tax costs against complainant.[39] Under a statute authorizing the court to award costs against the successful party for good cause, the court has power to award costs against plaintiff on making an injunction perpetual where the necessity for the perpetuation of the writ of injunction was due to his own carelessness and dereliction of duty;[40] and, where an injunction is perpetuated on grounds that did not exist when it was originally granted, it has been held that costs may be taxed against complainant.[41] Taxing plaintiff with costs on dismissal of the action on the hearing of an order to show cause is premature where the motion to dismiss should have been heard at term and not on the hearing of the order to show cause.[42]

Against both complainant and defendant. Where the evidence is so conflicting that the bill is retained with leave to renew the application for an injunction, each party may be compelled to pay his own costs.[43] So, where each party is successful in part, costs may be divided between the parties;[44] where plaintiff obtains approximately one half of the relief sought, it may be held that neither party is entitled to costs;[45] and where, after the filing of, and prior to the hearing on, a bill to restrain violation of a building restriction, defendant made alterations in a concededly offending portion of a building so as to leave it in unobjectionable form, costs incurred up to the hearing may be taxed against defendant, and costs arising by reason of the hearing and thereafter may be taxed against complainant.[46]

Items taxable. Costs unnecessarily made by complainant cannot be taxed in his favor.[47] Where a penalty amounting to a certain percentage is allowed by statute, it is recoverable only under the conditions prescribed by statute.[48] Defendant, if successful, is entitled to the costs of a previous motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction, whether such motion was granted or denied,[49] unless the court at the time of hearing the motion ordered that neither party should be entitled to costs of the motion.[50] The costs in an enjoined action at law may be given defendant in equity where he actually had a legal demand for a portion of his claim at law admitted to be due.[51]

Sheriff's fees have been held taxable but should first be ascertained and allowed by the court.[52]

While it has been held or recognized to be proper under some circumstances to allow plaintiff attorney's fees for suing out and maintaining an injunction,[53] attorney's fees usually will not be allowed to complainant.[54] In some cases defendant has been refused attorney's fees.[55]

§ 222. Defects, Objections, and Exceptions

A party may be precluded by his acts, conduct, or omissions, or by provisions in the order or decree which are excessively favorable to him, from objecting to the order or decree or the mode of granting the injunction; and irregularities in the procedure may be of such a technical nature as not to affect the validity of the decree.

Noncompliance with the technical formalities relating to pleadings or procedure may not affect the validity of the decree.[56] Petitioner may not except to an order granting him the relief to which he is entitled;[57] nor can he successfully complain of relief properly awarded against him.[58] Where plaintiff is entitled to an absolute and unconditional judgment for injunction, it is not error of which defendant can complain that the judgment gave defendant the option of paying damages or being enjoined.[59] Also defendants against whom a decree for a mandatory injunction has been rendered have no just ground of complaint because the decree simply prescribes the work to be done and leaves to them free choice of means and method of performing the work.[60] It does not lie in the mouths of those who have brought about the situation necessitating injunctive relief to complain that the border line drawn in the decree between permissible and nonpermissible acts seems to them somewhat blurred and that there is a zone near the border line in which they feel uneasy.[61] Furthermore defendant may, by reason of his own iniquitous conduct, not be in a position to complain that the decree is impossible of performance.[62]

62. N.Y.—Conviser v. J. C. Brownstone & Co., 205 N.Y.S. 82, 209 App.Div. 584.

Objections to the granting of a preliminary injunction usually must be taken before final hearing.[63] The right to object may be waived by the acts of defendant,[64] or at least it may be so waived in respect of irregularities in the granting of the injunction;[65] but notice to defendant as a prerequisite for the issuance of a preliminary injunction is not waived by a motion to vacate or set aside the order granting the injunction.[66] Whether the objection that equitable jurisdiction is lacking because of the existence of an adequate remedy at law is waived by failure to appear or answer depends on whether the existence of an adequate remedy at law does not or does so plainly or clearly appear that the trial court should of its own motion raise the objection.[67] Where defendant, after filing an answer, took it from the courthouse without calling the trial court's attention thereto and requesting a hearing, there was such negligence on his part as to deprive him after the term of any right to complain of an adverse judgment.[68]

§ 223. Enforcement

Where the court which granted an injunction had jurisdiction to do so, its jurisdiction continues for the purpose of enforcing the order or decree at the instance of the party who obtained it.

Where, by reason of lack of notice required by statute, the court was without jurisdiction to make the restraining order in question, any act looking to the enforcement of such order is clearly in excess of the jurisdiction of the court;[69] but where the court had jurisdiction to make or render the injunctive order or decree jurisdiction continues in it to enforce such order or decree.[70] The court which granted an injunction is invested with large discretion in enforcing obedience to its mandate;[71] and an objection that the decree cannot be enforced is without substance or validity where all the parties who acted in concert to create the condition complained of are before the court and subject to its mandate.[72] The writ or decree may be enforced by contempt proceedings, as discussed infra § 257 et seq, and sometimes a writ of assistance is proper.[73] The court which has ordered that a particular use of property shall cease can stop the operation of the property, to insure that it will not be operated in a forbidden way, until such time as the court is satisfied that its orders will be obeyed.[74] However, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to police complainant's property in anticipation of future violations threatened.[75]

Subject to appropriate limitations,[76] the party who obtained an injunction has a right to have it enforced by the court;[77] but the injunction ordinarily will not be enforced at the instance of a third person who is not himself entitled to the restraint.[78]

V. CONTINUING, DISSOLVING, DISCHARGING, OR MODIFYING INJUNCTIONS

§ 224. Persons Entitled to Make Application

As a general rule, only a party with a substantial interest may move to dissolve an injunction. One who has violated the injunction is not thereby absolutely barred from moving its dissolution; but if he has been found in contempt he cannot ordinarily move to dissolve until he purges himself of contempt.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[79] it is generally held that only a party to the suit can move to dissolve the injunction,[80] and he must have a substantial interest;[81] but defendant who has not been served may appear and move to dissolve,[82] although by the practice of the particular jurisdiction, he may be required to obtain leave of court so to do.[83] The mere fact that the moving party has violated the injunction, where he has not been adjudged guilty of contempt, does not preclude the motion,[84] especially where the nature and extent of the punishment to be inflicted for the contempt must depend somewhat on the determination of the motion to dissolve.[85] In any event, when the court entertains the motion, the fact that defendant has violated the injunction will influence the court against granting his motion in so far as the decision is discretionary.[86] A person who has not complied with an injunction has no right to ask for a modification of it.[87]

Parties in contempt. Although there is some authority to the effect that the court may in its discretion dissolve an injunction, even though defendant is in contempt for violating it,[88] the general rule is that one who is in contempt of court for disobeying its injunction cannot move to dissolve until he purges himself of the contempt,[89] although he has a legal right to demand a hearing respecting the regularity and propriety of an ex parte order granting the injunction.[90]

§ 225. Persons Who May Oppose Application

New parties brought in as complainants, as well as the original complainants, may oppose the dissolution of an injunction.

Aside from the original complainants, the dissolution of an injunction may be opposed by new parties who have been properly brought in as complainants;[91] but interveners cannot oppose unless they show that they themselves would have been entitled to the issuance of the injunction.[92]

§ 226. Discretion of Court

The continuation, modification, or dissolution of an injunction or restraining order is very largely a matter of discretion.

or restraining order,[94] or the modification of an injunction[95] or restraining order,[96] like the granting or refusing of an injunction or restraining order, considered supra § 14, is very largely a matter of judicial discretion to be determined by the facts of each particular case. This discretion is not an arbitrary one, but a sound legal discretion to be exercised with a proper regard to established rules;[97] and should be so exercised as to prevent injury, having in mind the situation of the parties.[98] The court which is to exercise this discretion is the court of original jurisdiction and not the appellate court.[99]

Prospect of irreparable injury. By express provisions of some statutes this discretion does not exist at all where the act prohibited by injunction is such as may work irreparable injury to plaintiff;[1] but even in such cases the court must, on defendant's giving bond to dissolve, determine whether the act prohibited is not such as may cause irreparable injury to plaintiff,[2] and its judgment in such respect is subject to review by the appellate court in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction.[3] In the ab-

Where facts pleaded conflict

Where facts alleged in verified pleadings are conflicting on the issue finally to be determined, the matter of dissolving temporary injunction is largely within trial court's discretion.—Tips v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 110 S.W.2d 585, error dismissed.

sence of such a statute, however, even though complainant swears that an irreparable injury will occur, the court has discretion to dissolve the injunction on security to be given by defendant.[4]

Decision dependent on question of law. It has been held that the rule that the dissolution of a temporary injunction rests in the sound discretion of the trial court does not apply to cases involving questions of law arising on the face of the petition itself.[5] Thus, the court has no discretion, but must dissolve the injunction, where the only question is as to the validity of a statute, and from the face of the pleadings it appears that as a matter of law complainant has no right to an injunction.[6]

Dissolution for want of jurisdiction by the issuing court is not a matter of discretion.[7]

Control of discretion by reviewing court. As considered in Appeal and Error § 1591, in the absence of manifest abuse of discretion, an appellate court will not review or control discretionary rulings as to the continuance, dissolution, or modification of an injunction or restraining order. The reviewing court will require a very clear case of prejudicial error before reversing a ruling affecting an interlocutory injunction, for the ruling does not operate as a final adjudication, and ordinarily the rights of the parties may be fully protected when the case is heard on its merits.[8] It is similarly held, as considered in the C.J.S. title Mandamus § 110, also 38 C.J. p 653 note 59, that the discretion of the court in continuing, dissolving, or modifying injunctions will not ordinarily be controlled by mandamus.

§ 227. Relative Convenience or Injury

The relative convenience or injury to the parties likely to result from the court's decision may be of controlling weight in determining whether an injunction should be continued or dissolved.

The principle, considered supra § 30, that the relative convenience or inconvenience that may be suffered by the parties by the allowance of a temporary injunction may be of controlling weight in determining whether such an injunction may be granted, applies with equal force to applications to dissolve injunctions.[9] Where the dissolution would work greater injury to complainant than its continuance would cause defendant, the injunction will ordinarily be continued.[10] If the continuance will work no injury but will merely maintain the status quo the injunction will not be dissolved.[11] On the other hand, the injunction will be dissolved in case it appears that greater injury is being done by its continuance than will be done by its dissolution,[12] especially where the equities of the bill are fully answered;[13] and even though the equity of the bill is not answered, the court may in its discretion dissolve the injunction on grounds of relative convenience.[14]

In considering a motion to dissolve, the interests of the public and third persons will be given weight.

As in the case of granting or refusing an injunction, considered supra § 31, the interests of the public and third persons will be given weight in considering a motion to dissolve.[15] For instance, where a public improvement is being interfered with by the continuance of the injunction, a dissolution will be favored;[16] while if the dissolution of an injunction would cause interference with, and confusion in, the public schools, the injunction will be continued.[17]

§ 229. Authority of Court or Officer

a. In general
b. In vacation or at chambers
c. Appellate courts or judges

a. In General

The court or judge who issued a temporary injunction has the power to dissolve or modify it; and, although a number of authorities hold otherwise, it is very generally held that a motion to dissolve or modify can be heard only by the judge granting the injunction, except in unusual circumstances.

On a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, all reasonable intendments will be indulged in favor of the power of the court to act.[18] Except where otherwise provided by statute, the court or judge who issued the temporary injunction has also the implied power to dissolve or modify it.[19] Such power has been held to be inherent in a court of equity;[20] and clearly it exists where the right to dissolve or modify is reserved in the injunction order,[21] or where it is expressly given by statute.[22] If the court in which the injunction was obtained has lost jurisdiction of the subject matter, it has no jurisdiction to hear a motion to modify or dissolve the injunction.[23]

23. Cal.—Danley v. Superior Court,

It is very generally held that motions to dissolve or modify an injunction or restraining order can be heard only by the judge granting it.[24] However, a number of authorities, some by reason of statutory provision, hold otherwise,[25] and it has been variously held that such a motion may or should be heard at special term,[26] or by the court that granted the injunction,[27] or by the chancellor of the district in which the suit is pending,[28] or by a judge sitting in the suit in which the preliminary injunction was granted.[29] The motion to dissolve must generally be heard in the district and in the same court in which the suit is pending.[30] It has been held that even where statutory authority is conferred on one judge to review the order of another, or to modify or dissolve an injunction granted by another judge, the power exists only in respect of injunctions granted by judges expressly designated in the statute.[31]

However, exceptions to the rule are sometimes made when rendered necessary by the exigencies of the particular case. Thus, an injunction may be modified or dissolved by a judge or judges other than the judge granting it, after the death of the latter.[32] A succeeding judge may modify a preliminary injunction issued by his predecessor.[33] So it is proper for the regular judge to dissolve or modify an injunction granted by another temporarily called in from another court by reason of the absence of the regular judge,[34] and conversely, a judge of a circuit adjoining that of a judge issuing an injunction pendente lite has jurisdiction to hear a motion to vacate the injunction, where the latter judge was absent from his circuit when the notice of motion was served.[35] Where one judge has issued a temporary injunction with leave to other persons interested to become parties and move for a dissolution thereof, another judge has jurisdiction to dissolve the injunction on the motion of such new party.[36]

Three-judge court. Under the provisions of an act of congress, a single judge has no power to dissolve a restraining order suspending the enforcement of a state statute on the ground of unconstitutionality. The hearing of an application for this purpose must, by the express provisions of the statute, be had by three judges.[37] The federal statute providing that no interlocutory or permanent injunction restraining the enforcement of an act of congress on the ground that it is unconstitutional shall be granted except on an application to, and a hearing and determination by, a three-judge court, does not require a petition to modify an existing permanent injunction theretofore issued pursuant to a final decree.[38]

A court commissioner has only such power to dissolve an injunction as is conferred on him by the court referring the matter to him.[39]

On court's own motion. Where it appears certain that an injunction has been issued in a case where the party asking it had no right to it, the court may dissolve the injunction on its own motion,[40] and without hearing[41] or notice.[42]

b. In Vacation or at Chambers

A judge may modify or dissolve an injunction at chambers or in vacation where, and only where, he is authorized to do so by statute.

While, in the absence of statutory authorization an injunction cannot be dissolved except in term time in the absence of consent of the parties,[43] in many jurisdictions, either by authority incidental to his power to grant injunctions at chambers or in vacation, or by express statutory authority permitting him to do so, a judge may modify or dissolve an injunction at chambers or in vacation,[44] provided the necessary notice has been given complainant;[45] and in such cases he necessarily has jurisdiction to settle all questions preliminary and incidental to the exercise of his authority.[46] Except as otherwise controlled by statute, a judge having power to modify or dissolve an injunction at chambers or in vacation has no power to determine the merits of the controversy,[47] the only question to be settled on the motion to modify or dissolve being whether or not the injunction shall be modified, dissolved, or continued.[48]

Place of hearing. Where power is conferred to dissolve an injunction in vacation without any provision as to where the hearing should occur, the judge may act in vacation in any county within his district.[49]

c. Appellate Courts or Judges

In some jurisdictions appellate courts have power to suspend, modify, or dissolve an injunction on appeal.

In some jurisdictions appellate courts have power to suspend, modify, or dissolve an injunction on appeal.[50]

In Kentucky the statutes giving a judge of the court of appeals power to dissolve a temporary injunction on motion do not apply to a permanent injunction granted by a final decision of the circuit court;[51] although the statutes authorize dissolution of a temporary injunction by a single judge of the court of appeals, this does not prevent the moving party from asking more than one judge or all the judges, if they will, to hear the motion, and their joint action is as efficacious as that of any one of their number.[52]

In Ohio it has been held that the general assembly cannot confer on a judge of the supreme court jurisdiction at chambers to grant or dissolve an injunction in a cause pending in another court;[53] and it has been held that the supreme court cannot dissolve an injunction issued in a suit in chancery pending in the court of common pleas.[54]

In South Carolina, although the supreme court may issue injunctions, it cannot dissolve an injunction granted by the circuit court.[55]

§ 230. Imposition of Terms

The court may in its discretion impose terms as a condition for the granting of an order continuing, modifying, or dissolving an injunction.

the imposition of terms should be made to appear.[58] The court may also impose terms as a condition to the allowance of the modification of an injunction.[59] The modification of a temporary injunction granted plaintiff on condition that his rights in the suit should not be prejudiced does not affect his right to relief.[60]

§ 231. —— Giving Bond

a. In general
b. Validity and operation

a. In General

As a general rule the court has discretionary power to continue, dissolve, or modify an injunction on condition that the party in whose favor the order is made give bond for the protection of his adversary.

If the right is doubtful and the continuance of the injunction will cause defendant much greater damage than its dissolution will cause complainant, or if whatever damage complainant will suffer may be amply compensated in money, it is proper to dissolve the injunction on the giving of a proper indemnity bond by defendant,[61] and this is especially true if any public interests will suffer by continuing the injunction in force pending the litigation.[62] Where, however, the right to a dissolution of the injunction on giving bond is regulated by statute, a strict compliance with the statutory requirements is necessary;[63] and it is only in cases where the facts bring the case within the provisions of the statute that an injunction will be dissolved on giving bond.[64] The court will not dissolve an injunction on the giving of bond where the legal right is plain and clear and the violation of it is undoubted;[65] where complainant is likely to suffer an irreparable loss not to be adequately estimated or compensated in money in case the injunction is dissolved;[66] where the court finds that the status should be preserved;[67] or where, by the terms of a criminal or a quasi-criminal statute, it is made the mandatory duty of the attorney general to enjoin persons from violating its provisions.[68] An injunction, at the suit of a city to restrain defendant from carrying on a business until his license is paid, cannot be dissolved on bond.[69] In any event the matter rests largely in the discretion of the court,[70] and this discretion is not affected by reason of a sworn allegation in the petition that the acts apprehended will cause irreparable injury, for such allegations are not conclusive;[71] but allegations of fact as to the consequences of dissolving the injunction must be taken as true on a motion to dissolve on bond.[72] Where it appears that plaintiff is not entitled to a trial on the merits, a statutory bond is not required on dissolution of the injunction.[73]

On modification of an injunction, defendant may likewise be required to give a proper indemnity bond.[74]

Injury to another

Under the statute authorizing dissolution of injunction on bond, when the act prohibited is not such as may work irreparable injury to plaintiff, it is not sufficient that injury may be done to some one else.—First Evangelist Baptist Church v. Smith, 95 So. 595, 153 La. 174.

What is irreparable injury

If injury from dissolution of injunction on bond is one for which party cannot be adequately compensated in damages, or if damages cannot be measured by pecuniary standard, or if act prohibited is contrary to public policy, injury is irreparable.—O'Beirne v. On continuance. On an application to vacate an injunction, the injunction may be continued on condition that an undertaking be given for the benefit of applicant.[75] If, at any time pending the litigation, it is made to appear to the court that the undertaking is insufficient, the court must require an increase of the undertaking as the condition of continuance of the injunction.[76]

Amount of the bond to be given on dissolution must be commensurate with the damages which plaintiff will sustain if the acts of defendant shall be committed.[77]

b. Validity and Operation

General rules govern the validity and operation of dissolution bonds. The dissolution itself is sufficient consideration for the execution of the undertaking.

The dissolution of a temporary injunction is sufficient consideration for the execution of the undertaking.[78] Although the instrument does not name the obligee, the obligee may be sufficiently designated by referring to him as plaintiff in the suit pending.[79] Even though there is no express promise to pay, the surety is liable where the undertaking provides that it shall be void if defendant carries out any decree rendered against him.[80] In the absence of a statutory provision for the giving of a dissolution bond, a voluntary undertaking executed pursuant to an order dissolving an injunction will be enforced as a common-law obligation.[81] A bond executed by purchasers of property who had been enjoined from removing it during the pendency of an action to enforce a lien against it is discharged by the causing of an attachment to be levied against it and by taking possession of the property under the writ.[82] Where, pending an injunction suit, defendants executed a bond to stay the injunction, agreeing to pay any damages recovered in an action thereon, the filing of an amended complaint in the injunction suit, instead of the institution of a new action, on which complaint damages were recovered, did not prevent the judgment from becoming conclusive on the surety.[83]

The measure of damages for which the surety is liable is governed by general rules.[84]

Substitution of surety. Where, to dissolve an interlocutory injunction, defendants as principal and a surety company executed a bond conditioned as provided in the injunctive order, even though the trial judge may have been authorized to order a substitution of surety without notice to plaintiff before the verdict and final judgment, he could not do so after the determination of the case.[85]

§ 232. Successive Applications

After denial of a motion to dissolve, a second motion based on the same grounds will ordinarily be denied unless the first denial was without prejudice. A second motion is proper, however, after amendment of the answer.

A defendant who has once moved unsuccessfully for the dissolution of an injunction as a rule is not permitted to make a second motion for the same object on the same papers, without leave of the court first obtained,[86] and hence a second motion to dissolve an injunction based on the same grounds as the first ordinarily will be denied,[87] although the fact that the court has erroneously refused to dissolve on the first motion may require a dissolution on a second motion where the facts are the same.[88] Where the denial of the first motion was without prejudice to a second motion, a second or further motion is proper.[89] A second motion is also proper after an amendment of the answer.[90] The refusal to entertain a motion to vacate an ex parte order because proper notice of the motion had not been given does not preclude a second motion for the same purpose.[91] Unreasonable delay interposed to the trial of the action by defendant is a sufficient ground for a renewal of a motion to vacate an injunction.[92] A defendant who, by moving to dissolve an injunction without raising objections to its having been issued without notice or bond, waived such objections could not raise them by an amended motion.[93]

§ 233. Continuing Injunction

Whether or not an injunction shall be continued to full proof on final hearing depends on a variety of considerations.

Many considerations are influential with the chancellor in determining whether he shall continue an injunction to full proof on final hearing.[94] Thus the court will consider the equities of all the parties,[95] the solvency of defendant and his ability to respond in damages,[96] whether defendant is protected by adequate security against any loss which he may sustain,[97] whether complainant will suffer more from the dissolution than the respondent from its retention, as discussed supra § 227, and, in general, whether any of those grounds for dissolution discussed infra § 241 are present. To justify continuance of a restraining order, it must appear from the verified complaint or from the affidavits that sufficient grounds exist therefor.[98] Under a statute providing that a temporary restraining order issued under it should be effective for no longer than five days, at the end of which time it should become void, it has been held proper for the court to continue such an order beyond the five-day period where the hearing is begun within the period but cannot be completed until some time later.[99]

§ 234. —— Grounds

As a general rule an injunction should be continued where it is necessary to the protection of plaintiff's rights or public interests, and where no adequate ground for its dissolution is presented. It is proper to continue an injunction where to dissolve it would require the determination of issues which could be better determined on final hearing.

A temporary or preliminary injunction should be continued and not dissolved where it is necessary to the protection of plaintiff's rights[1] or public interests,[2] especially where injunction is the main relief sought.[3] In general it may be said that, where it appears that a preliminary injunction was properly granted and there is no adequate ground for dissolution, as discussed infra § 241, the injunction will be continued and not dissolved.[4]

Payment of liquidated damages
Where contract provided for employment by one party of other party, who agreed not to compete in county, and for five hundred dollars liquidated damages in case of breach by either party, and judgment for five hundred dollars was entered against insolvent party, who competed in county, it was proper to continue an injunction restraining further competition until satisfaction of the judgment.—Bynum v. Decision dependent on ultimate rights. Where the decision on whether to continue or dissolve a temporary injunction requires the determination of important questions relating to the merits of the case and the ultimate rights of the parties, which questions it will be necessary to decide on final disposition of the case, it is proper to continue the temporary injunction.[5] So a motion to dissolve presenting the same questions as would arise on the trial should not be granted;[6] and, where a suit to enjoin sale of real estate was dismissed, and on appeal a temporary restraining order was issued, a motion to dissolve such order will be denied where to determine such motion it is necessary to decide the merits of the appeal.[7] Where an injunction has been issued to restrain trespass, and title is in dispute, the injunction should be continued for the purpose of having title settled by an action at law.[8]

Irreparable injury. The prospect that a dissolution might work an irreparable injury to complainant is a ground for continuing the injunction to the hearing,[9] particularly where there are doubtful questions of law and fact to be determined.[10]

Where dissolution would amount to denial of relief to which complainant might show himself entitled on final hearing, the injunction should be continued,[11] especially where no material injury will result to defendant by continuing the injunction.[12]

Prima facie case and probability of success. The fact that complainant's bill shows a prima facie case is a ground for continuing to the hearing a preliminary injunction theretofore granted;[13] but it has been held that this rule does not apply where important public works or improvements are sought to be stopped.[14] It is not necessary to the continuance of an injunction that it should be clear that complainant will succeed at the hearing; it is sufficient to warrant continuance if on the whole case there is probable cause to believe that he will succeed.[15]

Serious dispute or conflicting evidence. A preliminary injunction or restraining order may be continued on the ground that there is presented a serious dispute or controversy between the parties as to the merits of the cause.[16] So, too, it is proper to continue a preliminary injunction where the evidence raises a serious question or where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether grounds for an injunction exist,[17] especially where no harm will result to defendant by continuing the injunction and where a dissolution thereof may cause great injury to plaintiff.[18]

Harmlessness of continuance. The fact that continuance of an injunction would do no harm has been deemed an important reason for continuing the order;[19] but it has been held on the other hand that the fact that an injunction will do no harm will not of itself justify its continuance.[20]

Injunction restraining action at law. It is proper to continue an injunction restraining the prosecution of an action at law until the equitable rights involved are determined on final hearing,[21] and, if an injunction has been granted to restrain prosecution of an action at law until discovery can be had, the injunction should be continued until defendant shall have had a reasonable time to answer interrogatories, and plaintiff a reasonable time to coerce such answers.[22]

Indefiniteness of moving papers. Equity is justified in refusing to grant an order continuing pendente lite an injunction where the papers on the motion are so indefinite that it is difficult to arrive at the real merits of the controversy.[23]

Miscellaneous. It has been variously held that a preliminary or temporary injunction will be continued and not dissolved where dissolution will not benefit defendant, and the only acts enjoined were unlawful and the restraining order has proved efficacious;[24] where the equities are equally balanced, and defendant is protected by security from loss, and there are other considerations that weigh in favor of the injunction;[25] where sufficient time has elapsed after the granting of a temporary injunction within which the case could have been reached for trial and disposed of on the merits;[26] where plaintiff consents to a restriction of the scope of a restraining order, although in the absence of such consent the court might doubt the justice and propriety of granting the restraining order in the terms given;[27] where the temporary injunction has been violated during its pendency;[28] where the parties have entered into a stipulation to continue pending final determination of cause;[29] where continuing the injunction will prevent a multiplicity of suits;[30] and where previous conduct or agreements of defendant have the effect of estopping him from questioning complainant's right to the injunction.[31]

§ 235. —— Proceedings to Obtain

A temporary restraining order cannot be continued in effect pendente lite without notice and hearing.

As appears supra § 2, a temporary restraining order is effective to maintain the status quo only for a reasonable time necessary to enable notice to be given for a hearing as to whether such order shall be made effective pendente lite; accordingly, such an order cannot be continued in effect pendente lite without such notice and hearing.[32] On a motion to continue a temporary restraining order on the ground that the action is one entitling plaintiff to such an order, the complaint cannot be aided by plaintiff's affidavits.[33] The continued existence of a temporary injunction through judicial action may be effected by an order of the court refusing to dissolve it; hence in considering proceedings to obtain a continuance of an injunction it is well to bear in mind the proceedings for dissolution, as discussed infra §§ 247–255.

Order. On an application to extend an injunction against picketing, the court may appoint a committee to settle the underlying dispute.[34]

§ 236. Modification of Injunction

The court has discretionary power to modify a preliminary injunction where the equities of the case render such action necessary.

The court has power to modify a preliminary injunction where the peculiar equities of the case render such action necessary in order to do exact justice between the parties,[35] and it is the duty of the court to allow modifications or not according to the circumstances and the character of the relief sought.[36] In some jurisdictions the power to modify a temporary injunction extends only to such injunctions as have been granted without notice, the court being without power to modify before trial an injunction pendente lite which has been granted after notice and hearing.[37] The power to modify is in no way affected by the fact that the decree granting the injunction has been affirmed on appeal,[38] or by the fact that the court in granting the injunction may have chosen to discuss the merits of the case.[39] Whether or not a modification should be permitted is discretionary with the court;[40] and the order of modification will not be disturbed unless there has been an abuse of such discretion.[41] The modification may be made either by the trial court[42] or by the appellate court.[43]

At what time permissible. A decree retaining the cause "for further orders should the same be deemed necessary in the future, to in justice and equity conserve and protect the rights of respective parties hereto," leaves the court with jurisdiction to modify or change the decree at a subsequent term, and before final dismissal;[44] and independently of a recital of this character in the decree it has been held that an injunction may be modified at any time,[45] even though several terms have elapsed since the order allowing it was made.[46] On the other hand there is authority to the effect that an order of injunction entered at a prior term is not open to modification on a rule to show cause at a subsequent term, the only power residing in the court in respect of such injunction being to construe and enforce it.[47]

Generally speaking, an injunction may be modified where it is proper in part and improper in part, where it is unjust or oppressive, or where there has been a change of circumstances warranting modification.

An injunction may be modified where it clearly appears that it is proper in part and improper in part;[48] where it appears that great injustice is being done by reason thereof, and that the injunction is unjust, oppressive, and unmindful of defendant's rights;[49] where the restraint imposed is broader than is necessary for plaintiff's protection;[50] where some of the acts enjoined are lawful;[51] or where a modification is necessary in order to allow defendant to maintain his property in its then existing condition by repair or otherwise,[52] or to establish his rights at law.[53] An injunction may be modified where the law, common or statutory, has changed, been modified or extended, and where there is a change in the controlling facts on which the injunction rested.[54] Thus, if defendant has obtained certain rights by statute or ordinance, an injunction theretofore granted should be so modified as to allow the exercise of those rights.[55] An order granting a temporary injunction but not requiring a bond may be so amended as to require the giving of a bond,[56] or to render the injunction ineffective until plaintiff has given a sufficient bond.[57] Where defendant had been enjoined from further proceedings at law, a modification may be allowed under some circumstances so far as to permit a trial of the action.[58] An injunction may be modified so as to include plaintiff in the restraint,[59] or it may be modified so far as it is mandatory, and continued so far as it is prohibitory.[60] Vagueness or uncertainty in an injunction may be cured by appropriate modification.[61]

Injunction erroneously permanent in form. Where an interlocutory injunction is authorized by the evidence, but the injunction granted was in the form of a permanent injunction, it should be so modified as to make the injunction merely interlocutory.[62]

Modifications not permissible. An unnecessary modification will not be allowed, nor will one be granted when there is no sufficient showing that the restraint as originally ordered is improper.[63] A motion to modify an injunction granted after notice and hearing cannot be maintained on the same facts theretofore set up in defense.[64]

Modification of an injunction may be obtained by motion or other appropriate application.

Modification of an injunction may be obtained by motion[65] or other appropriate application.[66] On motion to modify, the court may consider all matters submitted in the original hearing as well as matters supplemental thereto in the proceedings on motion to modify.[67] If the facts appear on the face of the record and from the pleadings sufficient to authorize the court to modify a temporary injunction, the hearing of further evidence is unnecessary to authorize the modification.[68] An application for modification of an injunction may be denied on the ground of laches.[69]

§ 239. Suspension of Injunction

Subject to statutory regulation, the court has inherent power in its discretion to suspend an injunction when the exigencies of the case require it.

The court has inherent power in its discretion temporarily to suspend an injunction when the exigencies of the case require it,[71] but the question may be affected by special statutory regulation.[72] Ordinarily, where the injunction will cause defendant great loss, it may be temporarily suspended on terms that will properly protect complainant,[73] and the suspension of an injunction may be authorized by reason of a change in conditions subsequent to the allowance of the injunction.[74] It has been held that a final injunction restraining the construction of a building on complainant's land until the parties agree on the proper damages for plaintiff will not be suspended until condemnation proceedings are brought to fix the damages, although the court issuing the injunction would itself be willing to consider a method to determine the damages.[75] A restraining order against violation of an existing statute cannot be suspended so as to have the effect of suspending the operation of the statute merely on the ground that the statute is to expire in a few months and that its enforcement would work a hardship on defendants.[76]

§ 240. Dissolution or Discharge of Injunction

An injunctive order is generally subject to a motion to dissolve, although it has been held irregular to move for the dissolution of a temporary restraining order issued to maintain the status quo pending a hearing on the issuance of a temporary injunction. In some jurisdictions, a motion to discharge rather than a motion to dissolve is the proper remedy for irregularity in the granting of the writ.

An injunctive order is subject to a motion to dissolve,[77] at least where it has been granted without notice;[78] and it has been held that, where an ex parte preliminary injunction has been granted, defendant should be permitted to move for dissolution without jeopardizing his rights or position ultimately in the litigation.[79] However, where a restraining order is granted only to maintain the status quo until the hearing of the order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not be granted, it has been said that a motion to dissolve such a restraining order is ordinarily irregular.[80]

Alternative remedy
The procedure by which respondent moves to dissolve injunction pendente lite on ten days' notice and appeal is taken from order granting or denying motion to dissolve is alternate to procedure by which hear-

Discharge of injunction. In jurisdictions where the rule prevailing is that a motion to dissolve can be founded only on a want of equity in the bill or on the full and complete denial of its equity by the answer, and that a motion to dissolve is a waiver of any irregularity which has accrued in the granting of the writ, as discussed infra § 241, such an irregularity constitutes a ground for motion to discharge the injunction which is the only procedure by which it can be availed of,[81] and in any event the injunction should not be discharged until opportunity is given to amend.[82]

§ 241. —— Grounds in General

a. General rules
b. Procedural defects and irregularities

a. General Rules

A preliminary injunction may be dissolved for a variety of reasons including want of equity in the bill, want of jurisdiction to issue, and improvident issuance.

A preliminary injunction or restraining order may be dissolved for a variety of reasons,[83] a number of which are more fully discussed below.

Want of equity in the bill is a sufficient ground for the dissolution of an injunction;[84] and, where an injunction is granted on a bill defective in this regard, it should be dissolved at the earliest opportunity.[85] As appears infra § 247, while there is some authority to the contrary, it has generally been held that an injunction granted on a bill without equity may be dissolved on motion before the filing of the answer or after the coming in of the answer. Also it may be dissolved on sustaining a demurrer to the bill[86] in the absence of an amendment.[87] Nevertheless, plaintiff will generally be given an opportunity to amend his bill before dissolution;[88] and, as appears infra § 249, amended and supplemental bills will be considered on a motion to dissolve an injunction granted on the original bill; the injunction will not be dissolved where the amended bill justifies its continuance.[89] However, it has been held that, where the defect in the petition is radical, a temporary injunction should be dissolved, even though plaintiffs might make the necessary allegations and immediately obtain another.[90]

ing may be had before injunction pendente lite issues and appeal is prosecuted from order granting or refusing injunction.—Berman v. Wreck-A-Pair Bldg. Co., 175 So. 269, 234 Ala. 293.

81. Ala.—Acker v. Green, 113 So. 411, 216 Ala. 445.
32 C.J. p 434 note 79.
The distinction between the dissolution and the discharge of an injunction lies in the fact that a motion to dissolve an injunction, and action thereon, touch the equity of the bill, while one to discharge presents the question of sufficiency.—Grooms v. Brown-Marx Co., 184 So. 698, 236 Ala. 655.
Filing both motions
Under statute, filing of motion to dissolve temporary injunction does not waive a previously filed motion to discharge injunction, but the two motions can be made and considered at the same time without prejudice to either.—Barnett v. State ex rel. Simpson, 179 So. 208, 235 Ala. 326, followed in Broadfoot v. State ex rel. Simpson, 179 So. 208, 235 Ala. 388.

Want of jurisdiction to issue. An injunction will always be dissolved where the court by which it was granted was for any reason without jurisdiction to grant it,[91] as where the amount involved was insufficient to give jurisdiction,[92] where suit was brought in the wrong county,[93] or where an injunction was issued by a court or judge without power to award the injunction,[94] or who was disqualified.[95]

Improvident issuance of injunction. As a general rule, where an injunction has been improvidently issued through some mistake or misapprehension of the chancellor, it may be dissolved;[96] and in these circumstances the fact that an injunction bond has been given,[97] or that defendant has asked a continuance until the termination of another suit involving title to the property in dispute,[98] does not affect defendant's right to ask a dissolution of the injunction. Nevertheless, an injunction, although improvidently sued out, will not be dissolved if the facts of the case show that on the dissolution the party will immediately be entitled to that form of remedy on other grounds.[99]

Lack of reasonable probability of success. While, as appears supra § 234, it is not necessary to the continuance of an injunction that it should be clear that complainant would succeed at the hearing, it being sufficient that on the whole case there is a probable cause to believe that he will succeed, it is nevertheless essential that he should show a reasonable probability that he will be able to establish his case at the hearing, and, if this appears very doubtful, the injunction will be dissolved.[1] A fortiori is this so where it is obvious that there is no merit in plaintiff's case;[2] and the fact that great loss will result to plaintiff from a dissolution of the injunction is immaterial.[3]

Conduct of plaintiff. It is sufficient ground for the dissolution of an injunction that plaintiff's conduct in respect of the subject matter of the suit in which it was granted is such as disentitles him to the consideration of a court of equity,[4] or that the suit is collusive or in bad faith.[5] Delay in obtaining an injunction is not ground for dissolving it,[6] unless defendant is prejudiced thereby.[7] Plaintiff's failure, on learning of defendant's minority, to take any action to have him properly represented warrants dissolution of the injunction.[8]

In suit to enjoin former attorneys from testifying in proceeding in which plaintiff was a party, as to information acquired while attorney and client relationship existed between them, trial court properly dissolved temporary injunction, since questions of law affecting admissibility of attorneys' testimony would have to be determined by the judge in the proceeding in which the testimony of the attorneys was sought to be introduced.—Ragsdale v. junction that plaintiff has misstated the case by the misrepresentation of material facts, the injunction will be dissolved on that ground alone.[9] Such, also, is the case where he has suppressed material facts which good faith required him to disclose.[10] Where an injunction has been obtained on a misrepresentation of facts, it does not alter the case that the misrepresentation was through inadvertence, misinformation, or otherwise.[11] Nevertheless, a misrepresentation or suppression must be of material facts and must affect the merits; and, if the facts misrepresented are misstated and are not such as to lead the court to grant the injunction, it will not be dissolved therefor.[12]

Right to same remedy on new application. It is very generally held that, where it is apparent that complainant, in case his injunction is dissolved, would be immediately entitled to the same remedy on a new application, the motion to dissolve should be denied.[13] This rule, of course, has no application in cases where it appears that the party is not immediately entitled or would perhaps not be entitled to another injunction.[14]

Vagueness and uncertainty of writ. If an injunction is so vague and uncertain in its terms that defendant is not able to determine therefrom what he is restrained from doing, the injunction may be dissolved,[15] although, as appears supra § 237, vagueness or uncertainty may also be cured by appropriate modification.

b. Procedural Defects and Irregularities

As a general rule, mere technical errors or inaccuracies in the proceedings connected with the issuance of the injunction do not constitute grounds for dissolution, but the rule is otherwise in most jurisdictions as regards substantial errors.

Mere technical errors or inaccuracies of form in the bill on which the injunction is granted, or in the order granting the injunction, or in the other proceedings connected with its issue, are not available.[16] On the other hand in most jurisdictions, if the irregularities are not merely technical, but are substantial, the rule is that the injunction should be dissolved,[17] after giving opportunity to amend the bill;[18] but some courts make a distinction between discharge and dissolution of an injunction and hold that a motion to dissolve may be founded only on a want of equity in the bill or on the full and complete denial of its equity by the answer,[19] and that a motion to dissolve operates as a waiver of any irregularity which has accrued in the granting of the writ,[20] unless there is some statutory provision to the contrary.[21]

Misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties. A misjoinder of complainants is not such a material defect as to constitute a ground for the dissolution of the injunction;[22] nor is a defect of parties necessarily a ground for dissolution,[23] until plaintiff has been given an opportunity to amend his bill,[24] since, as appears supra § 186, the bill may be amended without prejudice to the injunction; but in case it appears to the court that justice cannot be done in the absence of certain parties, the injunction will be dissolved unless such parties can be and are brought in.[25] A preliminary injunction restraining the prosecution of an action in another state should be dis-

Want of or defective verification. An injunction may be dissolved for lack of, or material defects in, the form or substance of the verification of the bill;[27] but it has been held that even in case of such defects an opportunity to amend should be allowed,[28] and that the injunction should not be dissolved if before the hearing on the motion the bill has been correctly verified by amendment.[29] Some authorities hold that the irregularity of granting a temporary injunction on an unverified bill is not ground for dissolution, although it may be ground for a motion to discharge or vacate the injunction.[30] Failure to verify an unnecessary amendment to the bill is no ground for dissolution.[31] A federal court will not dissolve an injunction on removal of the cause from a state court on the ground that the bill filed in the state court was not verified according to federal chancery practice.[32]

Want of notice of application for injunction. If, under the rules considered supra § 180, notice of an application is required by statute, or if the circumstances of the case are such that defendant is entitled to notice, the want of it will constitute a good ground for dissolving the injunction.[33] However, the court will not set aside the injunction for want of notice if the case appears to be one in which the rule to give notice might properly be dispensed with,[34] but in such case it will retain the injunction and order complainant to pay the costs of the application.[35] Even where the issuance of an injunction without notice or hearing is considered an irregularity which can be cured, it is not improper to dissolve an injunction so issued without giving plaintiff an opportunity to cure the irregularity where plaintiff had a considerable time before the motion to dissolve was heard in which to cure the irregularity and made no effort to do so.[36] It has been held that mere insufficiency of notice is not a ground for dissolution.[37]

Irregularities connected with service of process. Although a contrary rule has been recognized,[38] it is generally held that the injunction will not be dissolved for mere irregularities in the service of the injunction or the subpœna;[39] but a total failure to serve may be sufficient ground,[40] and a failure to make a return of the service may be ground for dissolution.[41]

Failure to serve points and authorities. Under a statute substantially so providing, if a party who has obtained a temporary restraining order does not serve on the opposite party, two days prior to the

Where citizen protested that four-inch mains laid by water company were not contemplated by company's contract with city, and restraining order was served before joints of mains were sealed, or made leakage proof, or excavation filled in, delay in service of writ until main was laid and connected was held not to work hardship or oppression so as to warrant dissolution.—Alabama Water Co. v. Affidavit

In grantor's action to cancel a deed of record, where a temporary restraining order and injunction pendente lite were issued on grantor's affidavit, as expressly provided for by statute, but without service on defendant grantee of a copy of the affidavit, as required by the same statute, the grantee who made no appearance at the hearing was entitled on subsequent motion to a dissolution of the restraining order and injunction.—State ex rel. hearing, a copy of points and authorities in support of the application, the order will be dissolved.[42]

Defective or insufficient bond. It is very generally held a sufficient ground for dissolving a temporary injunction that no bond was given or that the bond given was insufficient.[43] However, it is a rule supported by many decisions that in such cases an injunction should not be dissolved absolutely and unconditionally because of failure to give bond or because the bond given is for any reason defective, but that the proper practice on motion to dissolve is to make an order that within a reasonable time a sufficient bond shall be given or that the injunction shall be dissolved.[44] If it is apparent that irrespective of the absence of a bond no injunction should have been granted, the injunction should be dissolved without giving to complainant an opportunity to file bond.[45] Even after an injunction has been allowed without requiring security, the chancellor may, in his discretion, order the injunction to be dissolved, unless plaintiff shall give security.[46]

Laches in seeking dissolution. After a long acquiescence in an order for an injunction an application for its dissolution will be refused in cases where the delay and acquiescence of defendant in the injunction have so changed the status of the parties that the subsequent dissolution would injuriously and inequitably affect complainant or permit defendant to exercise some inequitable or unfair advantage acquired by reason of his acquiescence or delay.[47] However, where no circumstances appear which would render the dissolution of the injunction inequitable or injurious to complainants by reason of the delay of defendant in moving for a dissolution, or by reason of his acquiescence therein for a long period of time, such delay and acquiescence will constitute no ground for refusing to dissolve the injunction.[48]

§ 242. —— Causes Subsequent to Granting Injunction in General

A preliminary injunction will be dissolved when the reasons for granting it have ceased to exist and it can no longer serve a useful purpose, or where the plaintiff by his conduct has forfeited the right to have it continue in effect.

A preliminary injunction will be dissolved when the reasons for granting it have ceased to exist and it can no longer serve any useful purpose;[49] and this is so, although the injunction will do no harm to defendant.[50] So, where acts have been discontinued, against which injunction is sought, and there is no evidence of any intention to renew them, the injunction will not be continued.[51] So, too, it will be dissolved in case complainant has subsequently obtained in some other way all that he asked in his bill.[52] An injunction against an official is not dissolved merely on the official's ceasing to hold the office.[53]

Laches in prosecuting cause. After an injunction has been granted complainant must use due diligence in the prosecution of his case or the injunction will be dissolved,[54] especially where defendant is being deprived of the use of property or is otherwise suffering loss because of the restraint.[55] In applying the rule as stated, it has frequently been held that the neglect of complainant to take out and serve a subpœna within a reasonable time, or within the time fixed by rules of court, is just ground for dissolving the injunction.[56] So it has been held a ground to dissolve that plaintiff has failed to use due diligence in filing or serving a copy of the bill,[57] or in taking testimony,[58] and setting down the cause for hearing;[59] and it is no answer to say that both parties are actors and that defendant might have entered a rule to close the testimony taken as evidence, and brought the case on for hearing.[60] So an injunction may be dissolved because complainant has failed to bring all the parties interested before the court[61] or has failed to use due diligence in obtaining an answer from defendants.[62]

The rule that want of diligence is ground for dissolving the injunction does not apply where the situation of the cause enables defendant to proceed.[63] If there is a reasonable excuse for the delay, a dissolution will not be granted on the ground of laches.[64]

Noncompliance with terms. As a general rule, it is ground for dissolving the injunction that plaintiff has not complied with the terms imposed on him by the court,[65] such for instance as to bring an action at law,[66] or to give bond,[67] or to make a deposit in court,[68] or to stay proceedings at law.[69]

Abuse of process by plaintiff. Acts of plaintiff subsequent to the granting of the injunction amounting to an abuse of the process of the court may likewise authorize the dissolution of the injunction.[70]

Statute legalizing acts enjoined or protecting complainant. An injunction will be dissolved where, subsequent to its issuance, a statute is enacted which legalizes the acts restrained,[71] or which provides adequate protection for the complainant;[72] and the possibility that such statute may be repealed does not prevent dissolution of the injunction.[73]

Lapse of time. A preliminary injunction or temporary restraining order will expire without motion to dissolve, in case it was granted to continue until a specified time and that time has elapsed.[74] Otherwise it will continue in effect until the hearing, unless sooner dissolved by order of court.[75] The restraint contained in an order to show cause "until the further order of this court," or "until this order be discharged or made absolute," does not become ineffective unless or until there is an order by court to the contrary, notwithstanding the hearing on the order to show cause is informally continued after date of its return, or is not continued at all.[76]

Consent of parties. Complainant may at any time waive the benefits of the injunction and consent to its dissolution, or he may render it ineffective by an agreement inconsistent with the terms of the injunction.[77]

§ 243. —— Proceedings in Action

The bill may be so amended as to furnish ground for dissolution of an injunction previously granted. The grant of a temporary injunction is sufficient ground for the dissolution of a temporary restraining order theretofore issued.

Although the amendment of a bill after a temporary injunction has been granted ordinarily does not operate to dissolve or vacate the injunction as of course, as discussed supra § 186, or in itself furnish a ground for dissolution,[78] an amendment of a bill may be such as to furnish a ground for dissolving or discharging an injunction previously granted on application for that purpose,[79] as, for instance, where there is a change in the purpose of the suit and in the relief prayed for.[80]

Issuance of further injunction. A temporary restraining order issued to maintain the status quo until the hearing and decision of an application for injunction pendente lite is no longer effective after hearing and issuance of an injunction pendente lite,[81] and this is true even though the injunction pendente lite is void for noncompliance with statutory requirements.[82] Accordingly, where a restraining order has been replaced by a temporary injunction, it is not error to deny a motion to dissolve the restraining order.[83]

§ 244. —— Dismissal or Termination of Action

Generally speaking, a temporary injunction is and should be dissolved when the cause is disposed of on its merits, as by dismissal or discontinuance or by entry of final decree.

Generally speaking, a temporary injunction, being provisional in character, becomes functus officio when the cause is disposed of on its merits,[84] and is dissolved as a matter of course;[85] but the ultimate settling of the rights of the parties on the merits does not determine whether the temporary injunction should or should not have been dissolved, since at the hearing of a motion to dissolve the court considers the circumstances as they appear at the time.[86]

Dismissal or discontinuance. On the dismissal,[87] or discontinuance,[88] or other similar disposition[89] of the suit, a preliminary injunction granted on such bill is thereby dissolved; and it has been held error to include in the decree dismissing the suit an order continuing the temporary injunction.[90]

Entry of final decree generally. Where a decree for a perpetual injunction is rendered, the order for a preliminary injunction is merged and ceases to have any further effect.[91] Also a preliminary injunction comes to an end by the entry of the final decree in the cause making no provision for an injunction,[92] even though an appeal has been taken therefrom[93] and no formal order of dissolution is necessary to effect such dissolution.[94]

Denial of principal relief. If the temporary restraint is merely ancillary to protect pendente lite a right of complainant, it is dissolved on a determination in another action that complainant has no such right, or on a finding in the suit for an injunction in favor of defendant.[95]

Mandamus directing act restrained. An injunction restraining a drainage district from paying any claim against it until determination of a suit pending should be dissolved on the motion of one who had obtained a final judgment against the district in which judgment was embodied a mandamus to the district to pay such judgment.[96]

§ 245. —— Death of Party

If the suit abates by death of either party, generally it is held that the party enjoined or his representative may have an order requiring the opposite party or representative to revive the suit, failing which the injunction shall be dissolved.

While in some cases it has been held that an injunction falls with the death of defendant,[97] there is also authority to the contrary,[98] and generally it is held that, if the suit abates by the death either of plaintiff or of defendant, the party against whom the injunction issued or his representatives may have an order requiring plaintiff or his representatives to revive the suit within a stated time, or that the injunction be dissolved.[99] A motion to dissolve an injunction on account of plaintiff's death will be disallowed as premature when made before decedent's estate is represented.[1]

§ 246. —— Other Causes or Grounds

Various circumstances not lending themselves readily to general statement have been held to constitute grounds for dissolution of injunctions.

In addition to the grounds discussed supra §§ 241-245, other circumstances have been held to constitute sufficient grounds for dissolution of injunctions among which are: That the acts sought to be restrained had been completed before the injunction was granted;[2] that complainant's interest could have been properly protected in another equitable action to which he was a party and to which he filed an answer;[3] that complainant is shown to have an adequate remedy at law;[4] that there is no danger of irreparable injury;[5] that defendant has shown a complete defense to the case made by plaintiff;[6] that the effect of the injunction is to change the possession of real property,[7] or to disturb rather than maintain the status quo of the subject matter;[8] that a lis pendens affording adequate protection has been filed;[9] that the statements to sustain

the bill are improbable;[10] and that to allow the injunction to remain in force would be practically to give to plaintiff all the relief which he could obtain by means of a final decree.[11] As appears supra § 27, an injunction should be dissolved where it is based on a new bill containing the same grounds as one on which an injunction had been previously allowed and dissolved. It should likewise be dissolved where a suit against the same defendant and involving the same questions as the suit to which the temporary injunction is auxiliary has been decided in favor of defendant,[12] but this is not so in case the prior injunction is merely to the same effect as the later one.[13] Existence of a previous injunction inconsistent with the one dissolution of which is sought is sufficient ground for granting the motion.[14]

Grounds held insufficient for dissolving an injunction include a ground which, although good at the time the injunction was obtained, is no longer so by the time of the trial,[15] and a misjoinder of causes of action where the rights of defendant will not suffer any prejudice by reason thereof.[16] A temporary injunction restraining eviction proceedings in the county judge's court should not be dissolved on the ground that relief may be obtained by a plea on equitable grounds in the eviction proceedings in such court.[17]

§ 247. —— Motion to Dissolve

a. In general
b. Time for motion

a. In General

A formal motion to dissolve ordinarily is necessary, unless the answer contains a prayer for dissolution. A motion to dissolve which does not urge the grounds of want of notice or bond is taken as a waiver of such grounds.

Ordinarily there must be a formal motion to dissolve,[18] but it has been held that a formal motion to dissolve is not necessary where the answer contains a prayer for dissolution.[19]

Requisites. It has been held that a motion to dissolve an injunction must deal only with facts alleged as a basis for relief by injunction.[20]

As waiver of procedural defects. While it has been said broadly that a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction constitutes a waiver of want of notice,[21] the more precise rule has been said to be that such a motion waives want of notice[22] or bond[23] where these irregularities are not urged in the motion, but that a motion to dissolve does not constitute a waiver of notice where the failure to give notice is expressly urged[24] as the sole ground,[25] or as one of the grounds,[26] for the dissolution.

Imminence of trial. The fact that the trial is near at hand has been held no reason for denying the motion to dissolve.[27]

Lapse of time before motion. The fact that an order granting an injunction was entered on the minutes of the court and that between the date of the order and the motion to vacate it and open the case for a further hearing a term of court had intervened does not deprive the court of power to vacate the order and rehear the application.[28]

Pendency of other proceedings in the suit may require a postponement of the motion.[29]

b. Time for Motion

Although there are decisions to the contrary, the weight of authority is that an injunction may be dissolved on motion before answer is filed, except in certain cases. The defendant may move to dissolve after filing his answer.

No general rule can be stated as to the time at which a motion to dissolve an injunction may be made; the matter is regulated to some extent by statutes differing in their provisions.[30] Where, under the principles discussed supra §§ 241–246, sufficient grounds exist, the rule in most jurisdictions is that defendant may apply for the dissolution of an injunction as soon as he has knowledge that it has been issued against him,[31] without waiting until he is served with either the injunction or a subpœna.[32]

Before answer. The weight of authority is that an injunction may, as a general rule, be dissolved on motion before an answer is filed,[33] at least where the bill discloses no equity;[34] but some authorities hold that ordinarily it is irregular to file a motion to dissolve an injunction prior to answer,[35] except where the bill discloses no equity.[36] However, even the majority rule permitting such motions before answered filed has some limitations and does not apply where the bill shows sufficient grounds for its issuance,[37] especially where fraud is alleged,[38] or where the injunction is granted until further answer and further order,[39] or where a discovery is sought,[40] or where the motion is unverified and contains no denial of the allegations of the bill.[41] Where injunction is the sole relief sought, and the motion to dissolve is addressed to the merits of the cause and is filed before answer, the motion should be treated as an answer and the cause decided on the merits, or defendant should be directed to answer the petition.[42]

After answer. Defendant may move to dissolve after the filing of his answer[43] and, although it has been held that ordinarily this will not be done,[44] the injunction may be dissolved even though the answer fails to deny the equities of the bill,[45] or admits all the allegations of the bill,[46] or is defective in form or substance;[47] and the fact that a replication had been filed has been held to be no objection to a motion to dissolve on bill and answer.[48] A motion entered after answer denying the allegations of the bill and alleging special defenses does not operate as a demurrer.[49]

Statement of facts as evidence
Motion to dissolve injunction could not be treated as general demurrer, presenting only questions of law, where on hearing court had before it, as evidence, agreed statement of facts.—Atlas Metal Works v. City of Dallas, Tex.Civ.App., 30 S.W.2d 431.

§ 248. —— Notice of Motion

Except in extreme cases, notice of motion generally is held necessary. The notice must state the time and place of the application, the proper court or judge, and the grounds on which dissolution is sought; and it must be properly served.

Except as controlled by statute,[50] the general rule is that an injunction will not be dissolved or modified on motion unless notice has been given to complainant,[51] and this is so although the injunction was obtained ex parte[52] or whether dissolution is effected by motion or by a counterinjunction.[53] However, it has been recognized in a number of decisions that in extreme cases an injunction may be dissolved without notice or hearing,[54] as where delay will result in serious loss,[55] and, in some states, where the bill on its face shows a lack of equity,[56] or where the motion is made in term and in open court.[57]

Form and requisites. If want of equity in the bill is relied on as a ground for dissolving the injunction, a general notice setting up want of equity will be sufficient;[58] but if grounds other than want of equity in the bill or that the equity in the bill had been answered are relied on as grounds for dissolution, they should be set out in the notice,[59] and grounds other than those specified will be regarded as waived.[60] The proper court or judge must be specified with certainty.[61] The time and place at which the application to dissolve was made must be stated.[62] Immaterial mistakes do not vitiate the notice,[63] and it is not necessary to specify in detail the affidavits that are to be used in support of the motion.[64] An order dissolving a temporary injunction issued against several defendants is not vitiated because the notice of motion to dissolve did not specify the particular defendant who purposed to present the motion, where it appears that a particular defendant was the real party in interest, and that the appearance was on its behalf, if not for others.[65]

Service. Service usually should be made on plaintiff's attorney.[66] In the absence of a statute fixing the time, the notice must be served a reasonable time before the day fixed for hearing.[67]

Waiver of notice. Defendant's failure to give notice, or defects in the notice or in the service thereof, may be waived,[68] and are waived by defendant's appearing and contesting the motion.[69] However, a defect in the service of a rule to dissolve an injunction is not cured by the appearance of the party merely to appeal from the decision on the rule to dissolve.[70]

§ 249. —— Use and Effect of Bill or Complaint

On motion before answer or evidence, or at any time for want of equity in the bill, the allegations of fact properly made in the bill will be taken as true. In considering the motion the court will consider amended and supplemental bills.

want of equity in the bill,[72] the allegations of fact properly made in the bill will be taken as true, and the injunction or restraining order dissolved or not according to whether the complaint or bill shows sufficient grounds for it,[73] at least where no other sound reason for dissolution is presented.[74] In this respect the motion operates the same as a demurrer.[75] All amendable defects in the bill may be considered, for the purposes of the motion, as having been amended.[76] After the filing of the answer the bill may be read as an affidavit to contradict the answer.[77] On motion to dissolve, amended and supplemental bills will be considered by the court,[78] even though they may have been filed after the motion was made;[79] but it has been held that amendments made after the motion has been presented and denied cannot affect the propriety of the decision.[80] If the answer does not deny the equity of the bill, the continuance or dissolution of the injunction depends on the sufficiency of the bill.[81]

§ 250. —— Use and Effect of Answer

a. In general
b. Limitations and exceptions
c. Nature of answer justifying dissolution
d. Effect of exceptions to answer

a. In General

In the absence of statute providing otherwise, it is a general rule that if the allegations of a sworn answer meet and deny all the equities of the bill the preliminary injunction theretofore issued will be dissolved.

The general rule is that, on a motion to dissolve an injunction made on the filing of a verified answer, the allegations of the answer, as far as they are responsive to the bill, will be taken as true,[82] at least in the absence of replication;[83] and this has been held to be true as to an unverified answer where answer under oath has been waived by plaintiff.[84] Although there is some contrary authority,[85] in the absence of statutory change or modification of the rule,[86] the general rule is that, in case the

(1) The rule "has been considerably modified" by statute which provides that, on the hearing of a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, the court may consider the sworn bill and answer and also such affidavits as any party may introduce. Under the statute, it has been held that an injunction should not be dissolved merely because the answer denies the material averments of the bill, since the denials of the answer are no longer conclusive.—Dudley v. Whatley, 14 So.2d 141—West v. State ex rel. Matthews, 173 So. 46, 233 Ala. 588—Castleman v. Knight, 110 So. 911, 215 Ala. 429—32 C.J. p 413 note 83 [a] (1).

(2) The question whether the injunction should be dissolved on the sworn denials of the answer rests in the sound discretion of the court.—Lindsey v. Viking Refrigerators, 3 So.2d 65, 241 Ala. 425—Irwin Fishing & Hunting Club v. Cobb, 179 So. 183, 235 Ala. 394—West v. State ex rel. Matthews, supra—First Nat. Bank v. Forman, 160 So. 109, 230 Ala. 185—Union Central Life Ins. Co. of Cincinnati, Ohio, v. Thompson, 157 So. 852, 229 Ala. 433—Fleming v. Bryars, 151 So. 846, 227 Ala. 660—Stout v. (3) In exercising this discretion the court will weigh the probable consequences that will result to the respective parties from retention or dissolution of the injunction.—Lindsey v. Viking Refrigerators, 3 So.2d 65, 241 Ala. 425—Irwin Fishing & Hunting Club v. Cobb, 179 So. 183, 235 Ala. 394—Union Central Life Ins. Co. of Cincinnati, Ohio, v. allegations of a sworn answer meet and deny all the equities of the bill, the preliminary injunction theretofore issued will be dissolved,[87] at least where complainant has had an opportunity and has failed to substantiate the allegations of his bill,[88] and this, as is discussed supra § 6, was the rule applicable to the so called "common injunction," restraining the further prosecution of an action at law in which defendant could not assert his equity, and issued for the purpose of compelling an appearance and full answer by plaintiff in the law action. The rule applies even though the answer may be open to exception on other grounds,[89] since it may be good as an affidavit although insufficient as an answer to the bill generally.[90] Especially is this rule applicable where the answer is verified positively, while the allegations of the bill are not verified at all or are verified merely on information and belief,[91] where plaintiff will suffer no irreparable injury in case of dissolution,[92] or where great injury would result to defendant if the injunction were continued to the hearing and no serious loss would be sustained by plaintiff if it were dissolved.[93] The fact that a sworn answer was not required by the bill will not prevent a dissolution on motion in case the answer is verified.[94] Even though the bill does not require a sworn answer, such an answer may be used as an affidavit on behalf of defendant, on the hearing of his motion to dissolve;[95] but under some statutory provisions, where a sworn answer is waived, such an answer cannot be used as evidence for defendant, at least where it is not expressly offered in evidence as a statutory affidavit.[96] An application to dissolve the injunction on the bill and answer brings up the question whether the equities of the bill are sufficient to justify the writ in the first instance.[97]

Limitations and exceptions to the rule are considered infra subdivision b of this section.

Amendment of bill after answer. Where the bill is so amended as to make a new case, defendant cannot ask a dissolution on the denials contained in his answer to the original bill, but must answer the bill as amended;[98] but where the amendment presents no new case, and the equities of the bill remain the same, the answer to the original bill may be relied on.[99]

Dissolution in part. Where the injunction enjoins the performance of several acts, and the answer denies the allegations of the bill which entitle plaintiff to an injunction against certain acts, the injunction should be dissolved as to such acts, but not as to the other acts complained of.[1]

b. Limitations and Exceptions

The general rule that a preliminary injunction will be dissolved on the coming in of the answer is not absolute, but depends in a large measure on the nature and circumstances of the case and is subject to the sound discretion of the court.

The general rule, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, that an injunction will be dissolved on the coming in of the answer is not absolute, but depends in a large measure on the nature and circumstances of the case and is to be applied subject to the sound discretion of the court,[2] which will refuse to dissolve the injunction if circumstances are apparent which call for a departure from the general rule.[3]

Where injunctive relief is primary relief sought. Where the preventive aid of the court is the primary equity and the ultimate and only relief sought, and a temporary injunction has been granted to prevent irreparable injury, the rule is that the injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of the answer, even though it denies all the equities of the bill, if there is probable cause for supposing that plaintiff will be able to maintain his primary equity;[4] and, as is discussed supra § 6, this is the rule applicable to the so called "special injunction," as distinguished from the "common injunction."

Answer not entitled to as much credit as bill. If the answer does not appear to be entitled to as much credit as the bill, the injunction will not be dissolved.[5] If, after the answer comes in, there remains a reasonable doubt as to whether the equity of the bill is sufficiently negatived the court may continue the injunction to the hearing;[6] and especially is this rule applicable where it appears that the subject matter of the case will remain unimpaired.[7] A fortiori an injunction will not be dissolved where the answer is improbable and unworthy of belief,[8] or where notwithstanding the answer there is a strong presumption of the existence of plaintiff's equity.[9]

Irreparable injury. Where irreparable injury may result from such dissolution, the court may in its discretion continue the injunction, even though the equities of the bill are denied in the answer,[10] or may make the dissolution conditional.[11]

Where fraud is basis of complaint. Where fraud is the gravamen of an application for an injunction, the court may continue the injunction until the final hearing notwithstanding an answer denying all the material allegations of the bill.[12] However, notwithstanding the gravamen of the bill is fraud, the injunction may be denied on the denials contained in the answer where there are facts stated in the bill which give support to such denials;[13] and, although fraud is charged in the bill, the injunction may be dissolved on the coming in of an answer fully denying the equity of the bill, where the bill presents a case which will not bear scrutiny in foro conscientiæ or where plaintiff does not come into equity with clean hands.[14]

Where construction of written instrument necessary. Where the answer denies the rights of plaintiff as alleged in the bill to exist under a written instrument, the court will not be bound by the answer, but will itself construe the instrument and, in its discretion, continue the injunction.[15]

Other exceptions. Notwithstanding an answer denying the material allegations of the bill, a dissolution of the injunction ordinarily will be denied if important questions are to be decided, for the solution of which further information is necessary,[16] where from the nature of the case the injunction cannot harm defendant,[17] where there are questions of doubt and difficulty on which the merits of the case may depend,[18] where the dissolution would work greater hardship and injury than its continuance,[19] or where there remains an issue of fact which is undetermined, the result of which may show complainant to be entitled to relief;[20] nor does the rule as to the effect of the answer apply if the injunction was granted after hearing, defendant having filed affidavits.[21]

c. Nature of Answer Justifying Dissolution

(1) In general
(2) Denials on information and belief
(3) Fullness
(4) Verification
(5) New matter in answer
(6) Answers to bills for discovery
(7) Answer by only some of defendants

(1) In General

To authorize dissolution the denials must be clear, positive, and unqualified; argumentative denials, or allegations of opinion or conclusions of law, are insufficient.

To authorize the dissolution of an injunction the denials of the answer must be clear, explicit, positive, and unqualified.[22] The material allegations of the bill must be denied with the same clearness and certainty as they are charged;[23] and the denials must be of the same positive character as the averments on which plaintiff's equities rest,[24] although it has been held that, where the charges in the bill are general and indefinite, great strictness will not be required in the answer.[25] Defendant must answer directly, without evasion, and must not merely answer the several charges literally, but he must traverse the substance of each charge; and, if the answer is deficient in frankness, candor, or precision, or is illusory, it will not entitle defendant to a dissolution of the injunction.[26] Argumentative or inferential denials are not sufficient;[27] neither are denials of inferences from the facts sufficient since they are not denials of the facts themselves.[28] Where the answer consists of mere allegations of opinion founded on belief only, it is insufficient to authorize the dissolution of the injunction.[29] It is insufficient for the answer to state mere conclusions of law; unless the facts on which such conclusions are based are alleged, the answer will have no weight on a motion to dissolve.[30] An answer is not sufficient which consists in mere denials of legal conclusions; the denial must be of material facts alleged in the bill.[31]

(2) Denials on Information and Belief

Subject to some limitations, the general rule is that denials on information and belief are insufficient except where the allegations of the bill are also on information and belief.

It is very generally held that the answer is insufficient as ground for dissolving if its denials are not positive and of personal knowledge, but are merely on information and belief,[32] except where the allegations of the bill or complaint are also on information and belief;[33] and the fact that denials on information and belief are authorized by statute as matters of pleading does not affect the operation of this rule.[34] The fact that defendant's personal knowledge is not sufficient to enable him to answer the bill directly from his own personal knowledge will not authorize him to make up the deficiency by affidavits, but he must wait until a hearing can be had on the merits.[35] Much less is a mere denial of all knowledge on the part of defendant sufficient,[36] even though defendant is an executor or adminis-

Limitations of rule. The general rule above stated is not inflexible in its application,[38] but certain limitations of it have been recognized.[39] Thus it has been held that a denial on belief, or on information and belief may be so strengthened by the allegations in the bill itself that the truth of the denial will appear probable, in which event the injunction will be dissolved;[40] and that, notwithstanding the answer merely denies belief in the facts stated in the bill, the equity of the bill may be so greatly impaired by reason of the facts and circumstances stated in the answer that the court will dissolve the injunction.[41] Where plaintiff knows that an answer on information and belief is all the answer defendant can make, and has omitted to make a defendant one who should have been made a defendant, and who can answer from his own knowledge to the existence or nonexistence of the matters charged in the bill, an answer on information and belief is sufficient to authorize the dissolution of the injunction.[42]

(3) Fullness

The answer must deny all the material allegations of the bill so as to leave it without equity.

The injunction will not be dissolved on the bill and answer where the answer does not deny all the equities of the bill.[43] On a motion to dissolve an injunction on bill and answer, the allegations of the bill which are neither admitted nor denied will be taken as true,[44] and if any material allegation is admitted or not denied the injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of such incomplete answer;[45] but, where defendant so far denies the allegations of the bill as to leave it without equity as respects the remaining facts not denied by the answer, injunction will be dissolved notwithstanding the failure of defendant to deny such matters as constitute no ground for sustaining the injunction;[46] and although the answer contains admissions, yet if averments in the bill denied which, if taken from the bill, would divest it of every equity on which relief can be based, the injunction should be dissolved.[47] Also an answer which denies such averments of the bill as are essential to give it equity will justify the dissolution of an injunction, although it fails to deny details leading up to the main allegations.[48]

Defendant's right to answer fully. Defendant, in denying a charge against himself, has a right to state the whole transaction.[49]

(4) Verification

The injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of an unverified answer.

It is a general rule that the injunction will not be dissolved on the coming in of an unverified answer,[50] and this rule has been held to be applicable even though the bill for the injunction did not require a sworn answer.[51] However, it has been held that a statute prohibiting dissolution of an injunction on an unverified answer denying the allegations of the petition before final hearing contemplates a dissolution on a denial alone, and does not

Where a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction is made on the grounds that there is no equity in the bill, and that the answer denies the equity thereof, and the submission is on an unverified answer, such an answer is tantamount to no answer, and the injunction cannot be dissolved on the denials of the answer, but it may be dissolved on the ground that there is no equity in the bill.—Auto Mut. Indemnity Co. v. Moore, 179 So. 368, 235 Ala. 426.

apply to a dissolution on demurrer on full hearing.[52] It is generally held that the oath to the answer must be made by defendant himself.[53]

Answers of corporation. The rule requiring verification of the answer applies to corporations as well as to natural persons.[54] The answer of the corporation must be verified by the oath of some officer or other person acquainted with the facts.[55]

Defective verification. Objections because defective verification of the answer may be waived.[56] If the affidavit to the bill was insufficient, the defect should have been pointed out at the proper time; and such defect cannot be relied on to cure a defective verification of the answer.[57]

(5) New Matter in Answer

Dissolution on the coming in of the answer may be sought on so much of the answer only as is responsive to the bill, and matters in avoidance cannot be relied on.

On the coming in of the answer defendant can ask for a dissolution of the injunction on so much of his answer only as is responsive to the bill, and matters in avoidance cannot be relied on in support of the motion to dissolve.[58] The burden of proving such new matter is on defendant, and to support his burden he must produce evidence.[59] Where, however, the answer denies the whole equity of the bill, defendant's right to a dissolution is not affected by the fact that he has set up new matters by way of avoidance.[60]

Explanatory matter. It frequently happens that defendant, in making his denial, is under the necessity of stating fully facts and circumstances going to show the falsity of plaintiff's averments, and such an answer is not obnoxious to the objection that it sets up new matter.[61]

(6) Answers to Bills for Discovery

Where a bill merely asks for discovery in aid of a defense at law, the injunction will be dissolved on the coming in of the answer even though the charges of the bill are not denied.

Where the bill merely asks discovery in aid of a defense at law, the injunction will be dissolved of course on the coming in of the answer, even though the charges of the bill are not denied.[62] Also, if defendant makes no discovery, but on the contrary negatives the allegation of the bill, the injunction should be dissolved.[63] On the other hand if the bill prays for relief also, as well as discovery, the injunction is not to be dissolved as of course,[64] but will be continued if indispensable to a protection of plaintiff's interests.[65]

(7) Answer by Only Some of Defendants

Subject to a number of exceptions, it is a well recognized rule that where there are several defendants all must answer before a motion to dissolve on the denials of the answer can properly be made.

It is an ancient and well-settled rule that, where there are several defendants, all of whom are implicated in the same charge, no motion to dissolve the injunction on the ground that the equity of the bill has been denied by the answer can be made until all defendants have answered.[66] Nevertheless, this rule is subject to limitations and the court may, in its discretion, dissolve the injunction, although all defendants have not answered;[67] for example, if plaintiff has neglected to take the requisite steps with all diligence to compel answers, he cannot set up the want of an answer against those defendants who have answered and have no power to compel their codefendants to answer.[68] So it has been held sufficient that those defendants who have answered are the ones against whom the gravamen of the charges is really directed,[69] and the answers of merely nominal defendants are not required;[70] nor are the answers of those who would have no knowledge of the facts and are not charged with such knowledge necessary.[71] Answer being waived by the bill, the injunction may be dissolved on the coming in of the answer of only one of several defendants.[72]

Independent interests. If the interests of defendants are independent, and the answer of one defendant not yet filed cannot affect the rights of the other defendants, dissolution may be granted on motion of those answering.[73]

Nonresident defendants. Where one of defendants is out of the jurisdiction of the court and cannot be compelled to answer, the chancellor may, in his discretion, dissolve the injunction without awaiting his answer.[74]

d. Effect of Exceptions to Answer

The filing of exceptions to an answer does not prevent dissolution of the injunction on motion of defendant.

The filing of exceptions to an answer does not prevent dissolution of the injunction on motion of defendant; the exceptions and the motion may be considered together.[75] If, despite the exceptions, it appears that the equity of the bill has been fully answered, as where the exceptions are not well taken, or are too immaterial, or are unresponsive portions of the answer, or are for impertinence merely, the motion to dissolve may be granted.[76] Further, the injunction may be dissolved on motion, even though the exceptions have not been disposed of.[77] On the other hand, if the exceptions have been submitted to, or allowed by, the court, the injunction will not be dissolved until the answer is perfected, unless the court is fully satisfied that the answer to them cannot have any possible bearing on the question of dissolution.[78] Exceptions well taken, on the ground that the answer fails to make discovery, are sufficient ground for continuing the injunction until the hearing.[79]

Objections considered without exceptions. The uniform practice of the court is to refuse to dissolve an injunction unless the answer denies fully and explicitly all the equities of the bill, although no exceptions are taken to the answer.[80]

§ 251. —— Affidavits and Other Evidence

a. In support of motion
b. In opposition to motion

a. In Support of Motion

The authorities are in disagreement as to whether, or in what circumstances, affidavits are admissible in support of a sufficient answer on a motion to dissolve.

There is considerable conflict of authority on the question whether affidavits are admissible in support of a sufficient answer on a motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction, and decisions even in the same jurisdiction are sometimes conflicting. Many decisions hold apparently without qualification that affidavits are admissible for this purpose,[81] and sometimes the statute expressly permits this to be done.[82] Other decisions have held directly to the contrary,[83] the view being taken that if the answer is not sufficient to authorize a dissolution it cannot be aided by affidavits.[84] According to some decisions, where a motion is made to dissolve an injunction on the answer, affidavits annexed to the answer can be read only in denial of affidavits annexed to the bill;[85] but, in case supporting affidavits are filed with the bill by complainant, they may be rebutted by evidence in support of the answer.[86]

Before answer. In some decisions it has been held that affidavits may be used before answer with much the same effect that the answer itself would have,[87] thus permitting a dissolution on affidavits fully and positively denying the equities of the bill, unless plaintiff by sworn answer or reply overcomes the showing made by such affidavits.[88] To have such effect, the affidavits must contain a specific denial of the facts and not a mere general denial of the equity.[89] Although there is authority to the contrary,[90] it has been held that, on a motion to dissolve an injunction before answer, an affidavit is admissible which goes to show that the injunction was irregularly issued,[91] or that the officer allowing the injunction was misled and induced to grant the injunction contrary to law.[92] Other decisions hold that affidavits cannot be used as a substitute for an answer for the purpose of obtaining the dissolution of an injunction,[93] but that defendant must put in his answer denying the material allegations of the bill and then move to dissolve on bill and answer, except, according to some other decisions, only in cases of waste and of partnership, where an injunction may be dissolved on affidavits alone.[94]

Supplemental affidavits ordinarily cannot be filed where the opposing affidavits merely rebut, and set up no new matters.[95]

Exhibits attached to a motion to dissolve may be considered by the court and constitute a basis for dissolution.[96]

Oral evidence may be admissible on a motion to set aside a temporary injunction under the practice of the particular jurisdiction,[97] but, under a statute providing that on a motion to dissolve the court shall consider the bill and answer and also such affidavits as any party may introduce, it has been held proper to exclude oral testimony sought to be introduced by defendant.[98]

b. In Opposition to Motion

The authorities are in conflict as to whether affidavits are admissible in opposition to a motion to dissolve.

As in the case of affidavits offered in support of a motion to dissolve, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, there is considerable conflict of authority as to whether affidavits are admissible in opposition to a motion to dissolve, and the decisions even in the same jurisdiction are not always in accord. Many decisions hold that affidavits are not admissible to support the bill,[99] or to contradict the answer,[1] except, perhaps, in a limited number of excepted cases,[2] such as an injunction to stay waste,[3] a nuisance, or an infringement of patent rights, or in cases to dissolve and settle partnership and other joint adventures where extreme misdemeanor is charged against defendant partner or joint adventurer,[4] or where irreparable injury might ensue;[5] but in most of these decisions in which the exceptions were stated the statements are dicta. On the other hand, it has been laid down broadly in some cases, usually perhaps because of some statutory authorization, that on motion to dissolve plaintiff is entitled to read affidavits in opposition to the motion.[6] It has also been variously held either because of, or independent of, statutes that after answer filed denying the allegations of the bill, on motion to dissolve an injunction, affidavits are admissible in support of the bill;[7] that where the answer is used as an affidavit on such motion plaintiff may file counteraffidavits;[8] that where the motion to dissolve is supported by affidavits plaintiff may file counteraffidavits;[9] that where the application to dissolve is founded on the answer and affidavits plaintiff may introduce counteraffidavits;[10] that where the application to dissolve is made on proofs by affidavits or otherwise, instead of resting the motion on the papers on which the injunction was granted, plaintiff may oppose the motion by like proofs,[11] but only when the application is made on proofs by affidavits or otherwise;[12] that where a defendant moves on a verified answer to dissolve the injunction plaintiff is entitled to read additional affidavits in support of the complaint,[13] although there is also contrary authority;[14] and that where new matter is contained in the answer not responsive to the bill and which is relied on as a ground for setting aside the injunction affidavits may be read to contradict such new matter,[15] unless defendant's counsel disclaim and waive reliance on any irresponsive matter.[16] So it has been held that, where waste or irreparable injury may occur prior to the final hearing, affidavits in contradiction of the answer and in opposition to the motion to dissolve are admissible,[17] and, as stated supra note 3, some decisions limit the use of affidavits in opposition to motions to dissolve to cases of this character.

Answer used for benefit of complainant. There is authority for the view that the answer may show that the injunction was proper, and it will not be dissolved, even though on complainant's showing it was improvidently issued.[18] So it has been held that complainant may use the answer of one of defendants in his favor.[19]

Reply. There is authority for the view that after the filing of a verified motion to dissolve complainant may by sworn reply or answer allege facts to overcome the allegations of the motion.[20] Facts alleged for the first time in plaintiff's unverified reply to defendant's motion to dissolve a temporary injunction need not be accredited with any significance by the court.[21]

Oral evidence. Under the statutes of some states on a hearing to dissolve a temporary injunction on motion, oral evidence is admissible in opposition to the motion.[22]

§ 252. —— Hearing and Determination

a. In general
b. Time of hearing
c. Matters considered
d. Burden of proof and sufficiency of evidence

a. In General

Unless the motion can be disposed of on the pleadings alone there should be a hearing.

Unless, under the principles discussed supra §§ 250, 251, the motion can be disposed of on the pleadings alone, there should be a hearing to enable the court to determine whether or not the injunction should be dissolved.[23] The admission of evidence on the hearing of a motion to dissolve is not discretionary, and for error a reversal of the order may be obtained.[24] The court may, if necessary, hear evidence other than that mentioned in the notice of motion.[25] The absence or neglect of complainant's solicitor to attend the hearing of a motion to dissolve furnishes no ground against the dissolution.[26]

View of premises. Notwithstanding a statute providing that a motion to dissolve shall be determined on the bill, answer, and affidavits, it is within the court's discretion to view the premises on which a nuisance is sought to be abated.[27]

b. Time of Hearing

The time for the hearing varies in the several jurisdictions.

Depending on the practice obtaining in the respective jurisdictions in which the question arose, on a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction it has been variously held that the hearing may be had at any time the cause is reached in calling the motion docket or at the calling of the cause for trial;[28] that in emergency cases the hearing will be set at an early day;[29] that a hearing of a motion to dissolve a restraining order issued ex parte in advance of answer should be had with all possible dispatch, consistent with a fair consideration of the subject;[30] that the motion will not be heard before the expiration of the time allowed for taking testimony,[31] or for excepting to the answer in case it has been filed;[32] and that a statute directing decisions on the motion to be within twenty days after submission is directory only.[33] It has been held that, where no motion is made to dissolve until the cause is regularly set for hearing on the court docket, the hearing shall then be final.[34] Where complainant moves to continue an injunction, and defendant's death is suggested, that fact should be tried instanter, unless the court is satisfied that there is a strong probability of his death.[35] In a cause removed to a federal court the hearing must await the return day.[36] On rehearing a motion must be disposed of as of the time originally submitted.[37]

Continuance. The court may in its discretion continue the hearing of a motion to dissolve,[38] but ordinarily only on a showing of great necessity.[39] A continuance will not be granted, even to allow complainant to procure further evidence, in case he already has had plenty of time to secure it.[40] Where a motion is continued at plaintiff's request, but, when again called for trial neither plaintiff nor his attorney is present or accounted for, the judge does not act illegally or arbitrarily in dissolving the injunction on bond.[41]

c. Matters Considered

On the hearing of a motion to dissolve the court ordinarily will not consider extraneous matters not based on the motion papers, questions previously determined or waived, or questions going to the merits.

While the court may properly consider all questions involved in the grounds for the motion as set out therein,[42] it has been held that the sole question to be determined is whether or not, on the facts disclosed, the court should have granted the injunction or restraining order in the first instance,[43] that is to say, whether a sufficient or prima facie showing has been made justifying the order.[44] It has also been held, however, that on a motion to dissolve an injunctive order the inquiry is limited to determining whether the order should be continued, and does not extend to whether it was regularly issued.[45] The court will not as a rule consider extraneous matters not based on the motion papers,[46] or questions previously determined on demurrer to the bill,[47] or contentions waived by failure to raise them at an earlier stage of the proceedings.[48] After answer, all facts therein except those by way of confession and avoidance, and all facts in the bill, may be considered;[49] but, except

On hearing of plaintiff's motion to dissolve temporary injunction granted on cross bill, court could consider as fact auxiliary to allegations of bill its former adjudication on hearing to dissolve temporary writ issued for plaintiff.—Pearce v. Atlantic Life Ins. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 36 S.W. 2d 553.

in so far as this may be necessary to a determination of the propriety of continuing or dissolving the injunction,[50] questions going to the merits will not be considered[51] unless the parties consent.[52]

Reference. Matters of fact may be referred to a referee on hearing the motion, and as long as his report is not set aside the court will determine the motion in accordance with it.[53]

d. Burden of Proof and Sufficiency of Evidence

The burden of proof is on the movant, although he is not required to make out as strong a case as he must on final hearing.

It is the general rule that on the hearing of a motion to dissolve the burden of proof is on the movant to establish the grounds for dissolution,[54] but it has also been held that the ultimate burden is on complainant to show the necessity of the restraining order, and that the question as to which party should be required to go forward on the motion to dissolve is largely within the discretion of the trial judge.[55] It cannot be said that any particular amount of evidence is necessary either to dissolve or to sustain the injunction, and in the final analysis the judge or chancellor must be guided by the weight of evidence;[56] but there must be sufficient evidence to warrant the court's reaching a conclusion.[57] Movant is not required to make out as strong a case as he must on final hearing,[58] or one which would entitle him to relief at all events on final hearing.[59] The injunction will be dissolved if the showing is clearly in favor of defendant,[60] or if the evidence is such as should prevent the allowance of an injunction.[61] On the other hand, the injunction will be continued if the preponderance of evidence is with complainant,[62] or if movant's evi-

Affirmative defenses not relied on

Dissolution of temporary injunction, on motion grounded on denials in answer and want of equity in bill, was error, where admissions in answer constituted foundation of bill's equity and affirmative matters of defense could not be considered because motion was limited to denials in answer.—Cox v. Lerman, 169 So. 724, 233 Ala. 58.

dence is weak and unsatisfactory.[63] If the evidence is evenly balanced, the injunction may be continued.[64]

§ 253. —— Order

Entry of a formal order or decree of dissolution or continuance generally is not required. Final disposition of the cause should not be made; nor should affirmative relief be granted to defendant in the absence of a cross bill asking it.

While it has been held that an order or decree dissolving an injunction should be set aside if the reasons on which it is based are not placed on record by the court,[65] the weight of authority is to the effect that the entry of a formal order or decree usually is not necessary to effect the dissolution or the continuance of an injunction.[66] Nevertheless it has been held that a mere expression of the chancellor's opinion that an amendment operated as a dissolution of the injunction does not have this effect.[67]

Character and scope of relief granted. The injunction may be dissolved either in whole or in part;[68] or it may be modified instead of dissolved in toto.[69] It should be dissolved only as to such defendants as move for dissolution.[70] It may be dissolved conditionally, as discussed supra § 230, or without prejudice.[71] Final disposition of the cause should not be made on hearing of the motion to dissolve,[72] or a decree rendered as to matters which should be disposed of only on a final hearing.[73] On dissolving an injunction affirmative relief ordinarily cannot be granted to defendant in the absence of a cross bill asking it;[74] and it has been held that, although defendant in his answer asks for damages by way of statutory penalty because the injunction suit is brought merely for delay, such penalty cannot be allowed by way of damages where the issue was not submitted to the jury;[75] but it has been held that, where the injunction has taken property from defendant, the order may grant restitution thereof.[76] So, on a mere motion to continue, the court has no power to grant defendant relief for which he has not moved.[77]

Construction and effect of particular orders. An order continuing a temporary writ of injunction previously issued until the next regular term of the district court of the designated county fixed the date of the convening of the district court in that county as the date for termination of the injunction, unless further action was taken by the court, and was not equivalent to an order continuing the injunction during the pendency of the cause.[78] An order denying a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction and providing that it continue in force until further order of the court had the effect of curing the error, if any, in granting the temporary injunction ex parte on a petition not specifically requesting such relief.[79] The affirmance of an order and decree vacating a temporary injunction on a condition which has been complied with by defendant constitutes a complete dissolution of the temporary writ.[80]

The denial of a motion to dissolve the injunction is not conclusive of the rights of the parties;[81] it is res judicata only on the question whether there was a sufficient showing to warrant the preliminary injunction or restraining order,[82] and on final hearing complainant may be refused relief.[83]

§ 254. —— Costs

Costs are largely within the discretion of the court; generally they will be awarded to a successful movant.

While the costs of proceedings to dissolve an injunction are largely in the discretion of the court,[84] and while they may be left to abide the event of the final hearing,[85] costs generally will be awarded to defendant on granting his motion to dissolve,[86] and it has been held error to award costs against a successful movant where no good cause is shown therefor;[87] indeed it has been held that, even though the motion is denied, movant may be awarded costs in case complainant has not diligently prosecuted the suit[88] or subsequently withdraws his suit before trial.[89] Complainant will not be required to pay costs on dissolution in case the injunction was rightfully obtained, but is dissolved because of matters arising subsequently,[90] but, on the contrary, may be awarded costs.[91] Movant is not entitled to costs where the motion to dissolve was unnecessary in view of the fact that it was made on the return day of the restraining order, at which time an application for a temporary injunction was denied and the restraining order expired as of course.[92]

What costs allowable. Movant is entitled only to costs of the dissolution and not to costs of the suit.[93] He is not entitled to an allowance for superfluous and unnecessary expenses[94] or for the expenses of a proper adjournment at complainant's instance.[95] Costs of an appeal are allowable under some statutes,[96] but not under others.[97]

Cost of ascertaining damages. Movant is entitled to the expense of the proceedings taken to ascertain the damages sustained by reason of the injunction,[98] in case there were any such damages as to render a reference necessary.[99]

§ 255. —— Effect of Dissolution

Dissolution of the injunction is res judicata only as to the issues raised on the dissolution; it is presumed not to be a final determination of the rights of the parties, and does not prevent the granting of a permanent injunction.

The dissolution of an injunction is conclusive and res judicata as to the issues raised on the dissolution,[1] but only as to such issues;[2] hence the general effect of the dissolution of a temporary injunction is merely to put the parties in the same position in which they were prior to granting of the injunction.[3] Since, as discussed supra § 198, the court is without power, on granting a motion to dissolve a

Entitled to weight

In action by owner of mining rights against owner of surface, to enjoin interference with construction of miners' houses, in which the determination of the question turned largely on construction of title papers, and the facts presented to court of appeals on appeal from judgment making temporary injunction perpetual were the same as those presented on motion to dissolve temporary injunction, which motion was overruled by a judge of the court of appeals, the whole court sitting with him, the court's judgment in determining such motion was entitled to great weight in determination of the appeal.—Bolen v. Standard-Elkhorn Coal Co., 275 S.W. 372, 210 Ky. 43.

temporary injunction, to consider the merits and dismiss the bill, an order dissolving an injunction is merely interlocutory and, at least presumptively,[4] not a final determination of the rights of the parties,[5] although the merits may have been considered in so far as was necessary to a determination of the question whether or not a dissolution should have been granted,[6] and the order does not operate to prevent the granting of a permanent injunction.[7] Ordinarily the dissolution of a restraining order bars a second application for interlocutory relief, unless such application is based on facts not known or reasonably ascertainable at the time of the first application;[8] but this rule will not be invariably applied,[9] and it has been held that an order dissolving a temporary injunction because of the absence of an appropriate prayer for relief is not res judicata of a subsequent application for a temporary injunction.[10] A judgment which recognizes that an injunction was properly sued out which dissolves it, owing to the happening of events subsequently occurring, is not one deciding that the injunction was wrongfully obtained.[11] The ultimate dissolution of a temporary injunction after a trial on the merits does not amount to a finding that the injunction was not properly issued,[12] since, as is discussed supra § 244, a temporary injunction generally is dissolved as a matter of course after the rights of the parties have been determined.

Order self-executing. An order dissolving an injunction is self-executing, and is not superseded by filing an appeal bond.[13]

§ 256. Reinstatement

As long as the cause remains undetermined, a dissolved injunction may be reinstated for good cause shown. A special order of the court is necessary for reinstatement.

As long as the cause remains undetermined, the court after dissolution of an injunction may reinstate it for good cause shown,[14] on a motion therefor,[15] which is in the nature of an original application for an injunction,[16] after notice,[17] or on a rehearing of the order dissolving the injunction.[18] The reinstatement is not a matter of course, but cause usually must be shown by further evidence,[19] especially where the dissolution was by consent.[20] A reinstatement will be denied after dissolution on final judgment, in which case the remedy is by appeal;[21] and an injunction will not usually be reinstated pending an appeal from the order dissolving it;[22] but, if the order dissolving the injunction was reversed on appeal, complainant is entitled to reinstatement of the injunction;[23] and it has been held that a trial court may reinstate an injunction even though the order of dissolution has been affirmed on appeal.[24] An opinion or order of an appellate court denying reinstatement of a preliminary injunction theretofore dissolved by a trial court will, if sound, be followed on a subsequent appeal from the final judgment.[25] A reinstatement will not be allowed where statutory requirements as to bond have not been complied with.[26]

Relation back. An order reinstating an injunction does not relate back so as to render invalid proceedings in the interim.[27]

A special order of court is necessary for the reinstatement of an injunction.[28] There must be a new exercise of judicial power.[29]

VI. VIOLATION AND PUNISHMENT

§ 257. In General

Violation of an injunction or restraining order which is valid and operative is punishable as a contempt of court.

Violation of a valid injunction or restraining order which is in full force and effect constitutes a contempt of court and is punishable as such.[30] Such violation is an indirect contempt where it does not occur in the immediate presence of the court or so close as to interrupt or disturb court proceedings.[31]

§ 258. Writ or Mandate Violated

a. General considerations
b. Effect of termination of injunction
c. Effect of modification or resettlement of injunction

a. General Considerations

A valid injunction or restraining order must be obeyed while it is in full force and effect.

An injunction or restraining order which is not void must be obeyed while it remains in full force and effect,[32] that is, in general, until the injunction or restraining order has been vacated or modified by the court which granted it,[33] or until the order or decree awarding it has been reversed on appeal or error,[34] no matter how unreasonable and unjust the injunction may be in its terms.[35]

Defendant cannot avoid compliance with the commands, or excuse his violation, of the injunction by simply moving to dissolve it,[36] or by the pendency of a motion to modify it.[37]

An injunction is not retroactive so as to make unlawful an act done before the injunction was granted;[38] but a judgment providing that a mandatory injunction should issue has been regarded as a mandatory injunction, for violation of which a person bound thereby is punishable for contempt.[39]

Where the issuance of an injunction is conditioned on the performance of certain acts by plaintiff, there can be no violation and no contempt before such acts are performed.[40]

b. Effect of Termination of Injunction

(1) Acts intermediate granting and termination

(2) Acts subsequent to termination

(1) Acts Intermediate Granting and Termination

According to some cases the termination of an injunction or restraining order does not necessarily relieve from liability for a violation of the injunction or order while it was in force, at least where the proceeding for violation is one for criminal contempt; but some authorities deny liability for a violation occurring prior to termination, at least where the proceeding to punish is one for civil contempt and the injunction or restraining order was granted erroneously.

According to some cases the fact that an injunction or restraining order has been dissolved or terminated[41] or has expired[42] does not necessarily protect a person in a proceeding against him for a violation of the injunction or order while it was in force, at least where the proceeding is one to punish for a criminal contempt.[43] It has been stated broadly, however, with respect to violations committed while the injunction was in force, that contempt proceedings may not be maintained after the injunction has been dissolved, abrogated, or otherwise terminated,[44] and it has been held or recognized that a proceeding for civil contempt for violation of a temporary injunction prior to dissolution cannot be maintained after such injunction has been merged and terminated by judgment in the main action,[45] especially where, after litigation of the merits, the prayer for a permanent injunction is denied on the merits.[46] Where the main suit in which an injunction is awarded is settled and discontinued, a proceeding in the cause for civil contempt in violating the injunction necessarily ends with the settlement of the main cause of which it is a part.[47] There is authority to the effect, however, that a person may be adjudged guilty of civil contempt for violation of a temporary mandatory injunction notwithstanding a final decree in favor of plaintiff was entered after such violation,[48] and that a proceeding for civil contempt pending when an injunction was dissolved will not be discontinued if the mischiefs resulting from the violation of the injunction were irreparable so that the further continuance of the injunction was useless.[49]

Reversal of order or decree for injunction. It has been held or recognized that violation of an injunction or restraining order subsequently reversed on appeal is not punishable as a contempt.[50] According to some authorities the rule is otherwise with respect to liability for criminal contempt,[51] and the reversal of a judgment granting an

Effect of settlement between parties
The fact that the parties to the suit in which the injunction is granted have entered into a settlement of the matters involved in the suit does not prevent the court whose order was violated from punishing the party in contempt by criminal proceedings properly instituted.—Gompers v. injunction does not prevent punishment for criminal contempt for violation of a restraining order which the trial court had power to grant.[52]

(2) Acts Subsequent to Termination

Acts committed after an injunction or restraining order has duly been terminated or dissolved are not punishable as contempts of court.

Where the force of an injunction or restraining order is spent by reason of the fact that it has been dissolved or terminated,[53] or has expired by its own terms,[54] there can be no punishment for acts prohibited but committed subsequent to the dissolution or termination of the injunction or restraining order, and the fact that the decision of the court in dissolving the injunction was erroneous does not affect the operation of the rule;[55] but where the injunction has been dissolved by a court without jurisdiction to dissolve a violation thereafter will be a contempt.[56]

c. Effect of Modification or Resettlement of Injunction

As to acts subsequent to modification of an injunction, the injunction as modified controls in determining whether the injunction is violated; as to violations prior to modification, liability, at least with respect to civil contempt, may be affected by the modification.

Where the injunction has been modified, defendant therein cannot be punished for contempt in violating the order as originally granted where the act does not violate the injunction as modified.[57] Where, however, on appeal an injunction was affirmed in all its essential details, disobedience thereof is not justified, although modified in some respects.[58]

It has been held that contempt proceedings may not be prosecuted after modification of an injunction, with respect to violations prior to modification by acts removed from the operation of the injunction by the modification,[59] even where such proceedings were commenced before the injunction was modified.[60] There apparently is authority for the view, however, that modification of an injunction does not necessarily purge a contempt committed prior to modification.[61] It has been held that formal resettlement of a temporary injunction does not relieve from liability for past disobedience of a provision of the injunction which is continued in effect by the order of resettlement.[62]

§ 259. —— Validity and Regularity

a. General considerations
b. Necessity of definiteness and certainty

a. General Considerations

The fact that an injunction or restraining order is merely erroneous, or was improvidently granted, or was granted or obtained irregularly, does not of itself excuse a violation of such injunction or order; but disobedience of a void injunction or restraining order is not a punishable contempt of court.

Modification creating condition precedent
Where a temporary injunction is modified, with the consent of plaintiff, by an order requiring the performance of certain acts by plaintiff as a condition precedent to the operation of the injunction, plaintiff must obey such order before he may charge defendant with contempt for alleged violation of such injunction after modification.—Ziegfeld v. junction the judgment or decree for injunction, if rendered by a court having jurisdiction, is not subject to collateral attack,[63] at least for irregularities.[64] Where the court had jurisdiction, the fact that the injunction or restraining order, or the order for the same is merely erroneous, or was improvidently granted or irregularly obtained, is no excuse for violating it;[65] and this rule applies with equal force to a prosecution for contempt instituted for the purpose of punishing a person for disobeying an order of the court on the ground that its authority or dignity is in question, and one which is instituted to enforce the authority of the court in the administration of justice between litigants.[66] Also, where the court had jurisdiction, disobedience is not excused by the fact that the bill or complaint on which the injunction or restraining order was issued was insufficient,[67] that the injunction is broader than that authorized by the order for injunction,[68] or that the injunction is broader than the statute authorizing the injunction.[69]

Where the injunction or restraining order is void and not merely voidable, disobedience thereof is not a contempt of court and not punishable as such,[70]

but the fact that an injunction is void in part does not excuse violation of the valid part.[71] In general it is only when the court which grants or makes the injunction or restraining order does not have jurisdiction that such injunction or order may be disregarded and cannot be made the basis of a contempt proceeding.[72] It has been held or recognized, however, that an injunction is void and, therefore, insufficient as the basis of punishment for contempt if it has no support of any applicable law,[73] or where the court is without jurisdiction to grant the particular restraining order.[74]

Record. It has been held that one may not be held guilty of contempt on the basis of an order which is not of record and which rests solely on a mere oral announcement of the court,[75] but the order is not void merely because the minute entry by the clerk of court does not conform to the oral decision by the trial judge.[76] However, it has been held that there may be a contempt of court in disobeying the terms of an injunction order which is neither entered nor filed.[77]

b. Necessity of Definiteness and Certainty

To support a proceeding for contempt the writ of injunction or restraining order should be sufficiently clear and definite in its terms to enable a person bound by the writ or order to determine what he may and may not do.

To support a proceeding for contempt the writ of injunction or the restraining order should be clear and specific in its terms,[78] and sufficient to enable a person bound by the writ or order to determine from its terms what he may and may not do.[79] If such party does not in fact know to what the injunction applies he will not be punished for contempt.[80] The party enjoined, is not, however, justified in disobeying an injunction merely because it is ambiguous,[81] and the fact that part of the writ is so vague as to be a nullity does not excuse a violation of the valid parts of the writ.[82]

§ 260. —— Pendency of Stay

The pendency of a motion for a new trial does not suspend the operation of an injunction decree as respects liability and punishment for contempt.

The fact that a motion for a new trial is pending does not suspend the operation of the decree as respects liability for contempt for violation of the decree.[83] The effect of an appeal from a decree or order granting an injunction with respect to staying the operation of such decree or order is discussed in Appeal and Error § 672.

§ 261. Knowledge or Notice of Injunction

A person is not guilty of contempt in violating an injunction or restraining order unless he has, or is chargeable with, knowledge or notice of such injunction or order, but actual notice is sufficient to bind a party to the proceedings regardless of want of, or defective, service of the injunction or order.

In general one cannot be punished for violating an injunction or an order for an injunction unless it is shown that such injunction or order was served on him personally or that he had notice of the issuance or making of such injunction or order.[84] Where, however, a party has actual notice of an injunction, clearly informing him from what he must abstain, he is bound by the injunction from that time, and will be punished for a violation thereof, even though it may not have been served,[85] or may have been served on him defectively.[86]

A party may not avoid the effect of service of an injunction order and resultant liability for contempt for disobedience by refusing to accept service and to read the order.[87]

It is altogether immaterial how defendant acquires information of the existence of the injunction; when once he has been apprised of the fact he is legally bound to desist from what he is restrained and inhibited from doing.[88] Where an injunction has been ordered or decreed, a party having knowledge of that order, who deliberately violates the injunction that has been ordered or decreed, although not yet issued, is guilty of contempt of court;[89] but, in order to convict of contempt, however, it must be shown clearly that the party had knowledge of the order for the injunction in such a way that it can be held that he understood it, and with that knowledge committed a willful violation thereof.[90]

Where an order of injunction forms part of a decree rendered in regular course, on issue joined by answer, the parties to the suit are bound to take notice of the order and are not entitled to have a certified copy of the decree served on them.[91] Where defendants or their attorneys are in court when the decree of injunction is rendered, they are chargeable with knowledge of its contents, and the decree need not be served on them, to render them guilty of contempt for violating it.[92] Mere want of specific or formal notice of filing and approval of bond on which the operative effect of an injunction is conditioned does not excuse a violation of the injunction or release from liability for contempt.[93]

§ 262. Ability to Obey

Impossibility of complying with mandatory injunction may, it seems, constitute a defense in a proceeding to punish for contempt for noncompliance with such injunction.

It seems that impossibility of performance, as, for instance, by reason of poverty or sickness, may constitute a defense in a proceeding to punish for contempt because of failure to comply with a mandatory injunction.[94]

a. General Considerations

Under some circumstances a person not a party to the main action may be amenable to an injunction or restraining order and punishable for contempt; a party enjoined may under some circumstances be liable for contempt by reason of acts of others for whose conduct such party is responsible.

In general one not a party to the suit or served with the injunction and who has no connection of any character with those bound by it, and who acts independent of them, cannot be punished as for contempt for a breach of the injunction,[95] and in such cases there is no technical "breach" or "violation" of the injunction in the well recognized sense of the terms as applicable to the parties to the injunction suit.[96] However, such a person, like other members of the public, is bound to observe the restrictions of the injunction, when known, to the extent that they must not aid or abet its violation by others nor set the known command of the court at defiance by interference with or the obstruction of the administration of justice,[97] and the general rule is that, in order to render a person amenable to an injunction, it is not indispensable that he should have been a party to the suit in which the injunction issued or that he should actually have been served with a copy of it.[98] Thus a person not a party to the main action may be amenable to the injunction or restraining order by reason of the fact that he is adequately represented in such suit,[99] or is within the class of persons whose conduct is restrained.[1] While such persons may be liable in contempt even though not served with a copy of the injunction or order,[2] ordinarily actual knowledge of the injunction is essential.[3]

Various applications of the foregoing rules are considered in the following subdivisions of this section.

Liability for acts of others. A person against whom an injunction or restraining order has been issued is bound not only to abstain from violating it in person, but also to endeavor in good faith to prevent its violation by his agents, employees[4] or assignees.[5] Such person cannot evade liability by permitting the act enjoined to be done by others in his presence and with his acquiescence,[6] and he may render himself punishable by aiding, counseling, or abetting others in the violation of the injunction or restraining order.[7] Thus a principal may be liable where the act charged as contempt is performed by the agent with the knowledge of, and pursuant to authorization by, the principal,[8] and a lessor is guilty of contempt if his tenant by his direction acts in violation of the injunction.[9]

On the other hand, a party against whom an injunction is granted is not punishable in a contempt proceeding for an act with which he had no connection and for which he is not responsible,[10] or for acts done by strangers without his knowledge or consent.[11] A person who in good faith has made an earnest effort to secure obedience to the injunction will not be held in contempt for disobedience by those in his employ.[12] So too a person who is not a party is not liable for acts of a party in violation of an injunction where such person is not connected with, and is not responsible for, such acts.[13]

b. Agents and Employees in General

Agents or employees of a party against whom an injunction is directed may under some circumstances violate such injunction and render themselves liable for contempt.

Agents or employees of one against whom an injunction has been granted and who have knowledge of such fact, are bound by the injunction as long as such status continues and are punishable for contempt in disobeying its provisions, although not made parties to the injunction suit,[14] and although they were not served with process,[15] at least where the injunction runs against the agents, servants, or employees of a party;[16] and they cannot excuse themselves on the ground that they acted under the orders of the employer or principal.[17] It has been held, however, that one who ceases to be the agent or employee of another is free to act for himself in the protection of his own rights and in the prosecution of his own interests, even though it involves his doing the thing which his former master was prohibited from doing;[18] but it has also been held that the injunction continues to restrain him from afterward committing the acts forbidden as a mere wrongdoer having no reasonable pretense of a right to do them.[19]

If the agent or employee has no notice of the injunction, he cannot be in contempt for a disobedience of its provisions.[20] With respect to an injunction against both employer and his employees, an employee is not punishable for an act of the employer in which such employee did not participate and with respect to which the employee has no duty, authority, or control.[21]

c. Aiders and Abettors

Persons who are not parties to the proceedings but who, with knowledge of the injunction, aid parties to the suit to whom the injunction is directed in violating the injunction are punishable for contempt.

It is very generally held that all persons who aid and abet parties to the suit, against whom an injunction has been rendered, in disobeying it,[22] or who conspire with them for its violation,[23] are guilty of a contempt of court if they have actual knowledge of the injunction, although not themselves parties to the suit or named in the order granting the injunction.

Nature of offense. Such aiders and abettors are not chargeable for "breach" or "violation" of the injunction in the well recognized sense of those terms applicable to parties,[24] and are not subject to commitment for contempt for a technical violation of the injunction but for aiding and assisting in the violation thereof,[25] being bound with other members of the public to observe the restrictions of the injunction when known to them.[26] No remedial contempt proceedings for the benefit and enforcement of the rights of the parties to the injunction suit can be maintained against them,[27] but the proceedings and conviction must be regarded as distinctly criminal in their nature and solely to punish for acts in contempt of the power and dignity of the court.[28]

d. Persons in Privity with Parties Enjoined; Successors in Interest

Persons who are in privity with, or who are successors in interest of, a party to whom the injunction is directed may be liable in contempt with respect to a violation of the injunction where such persons act with knowledge of the injunction.

As a general rule persons in privity with parties against whom the injunction was issued and who have knowledge of its provisions may be punished for contempt in disobeying it, although not parties to the record or named in the order granting the injunction.[29]

Successors in interest. While there is authority to the contrary,[30] it has been held that one who succeeds to the interest of a party to whom the injunction is directed and who has notice of the injunction, is bound by the judgment and punishable for contempt for disobedience.[31] However, the rule does not apply where the successor acquired all rights before the injunction was granted and the injunction does not relate to or affect any property acquired by the successor in interest.[32]

e. Attorneys

An attorney may by his own acts in disobedience of an injunction render himself liable to punishment for contempt, and he may be liable by reason of his advice to his client to disobey the injunction.

The attorney for the party to whom an injunction or restraining order is directed may be amenable to such injunction or order[33] and may by his own acts of disobedience render himself liable to punishment for contempt.[34]

An attorney who deliberately advises his client to disobey an injunction is guilty of contempt.[35] Attorneys who give erroneous advice as to whether certain acts would violate an injunction do not thereby subject themselves to punishment for contempt, however, where their construction of the injunction is reasonable and made in good faith, and does not amount in effect to advice to disregard the injunction.[36]

f. Parties to Suit Not Named in Order

Parties to the suit may be punishable for disobedience of the injunction notwithstanding they were not named in the injunction order.

Persons who were parties to the bill, but not named in the injunction order because they were not shown to have participated in the acts sought to be enjoined, are nevertheless bound with notice of the order granting the injunction and punishable for a disobedience of its provisions;[37] and a like rule applies to persons made parties but dismissed from the suit.[38]

g. Complainant or His Agent

The party who obtains an injunction is not liable in contempt if he performs the acts enjoined unless he is restrained in that regard by the terms of the injunction.

Unless the injunction in terms restrains the person who obtains its allowance, he is not liable in contempt for doing the acts enjoined,[39] the effect of the injunction generally being only to restrain defendant and subject him to punishment in case of a violation thereof.[40] Acts done by one acting only as an agent of plaintiff do not violate an injunction running only against defendants, their agents, and confederates.[41]

However, where the purpose of the writ is to preserve the existing status of property in litigation until a final adjudication may be had, it is a gross abuse of the process of the court for plaintiff to disregard his own injunction after having by means thereof tied the hands of his adversary,[42] and, while plaintiff is not liable to punishment as for contempt, the court has ample power otherwise to prevent or redress such abuse,[43] and may do so by ordering plaintiff to restore the property to defendant and to abstain from any further interference with the possession thereof pending suit.[44]

h. Private Corporation and Its Officers, Agents, and Employees

A private corporation is subject to punishment for contempt for violation of an injunction, and officers, agents, or others who act for a corporation may be punishable for contempt under some circumstances.

A private corporation is subject to punishment for a contempt.[45] Officers, agents, or others who act for a corporation and who knowingly violate or disobey an injunction against the corporation are punishable for contempt[46] even though the injunction is issued only against the corporation,[47] and, where an injunction is granted against the treasurer of a corporation, restraining him from collecting any royalties or dividends of stock due the corporation, and such royalties and dividends are afterward paid into its treasury, the treasurer and corporation are alike guilty of contempt.[48]

Where the injunction does not operate against an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation personally, it has been held that an officer, agent, or employee who has severed his connection with the corporation does not violate the injunction so as to render himself liable for contempt by doing the forbidden act himself or by assisting outsiders to do it,[49] unless his purpose was to avoid the effect of the injunction.[50] An individual who, after being enjoined, forms a connection with a corporation which with his assistance commits acts in violation of the injunction is punishable for contempt.[51]

Officers or agents of a corporation are not liable for the violation of an injunction against the corporation if they neither do anything contrary to the injunction nor conduce to its violation by concealing the fact that it has been issued.[52]

While the propriety of punishing a voluntary, unincorporated association for contempt in violating an injunction has been denied,[53] if such association has the status of a judicial entity, it may be liable.[54] The officers or agents of such an association also may be punishable for contempt in violating an injunction,[55] as may members of such association who participate in the violation of the injunction.[56]

j. Public Officials in General

Public officers may be punishable for contempt because of acts in violation of injunctions.

Public officers and others acting in legal proceedings may be guilty of contempt in doing acts prohibited by the court and punishable therefor.[57]

k. Municipal Corporation and Its Officers and Agents

According to some, but not all, authorities a municipal corporation may not be punished in a contempt proceeding for violation of an injunction; officers or agents or a municipal corporation may be liable.

There have been holdings or expressions to the effect that a municipal corporation cannot be guilty of contempt in disobeying an injunction,[58] but there is authority to the contrary.[59]

An injunction against such corporation is binding on all individuals acting for the corporation to whose knowledge the injunction comes, although not parties to the suit,[60] and the officers and agents of a municipal corporation through whom it acts may be punished where they had notice of the injunction.[61]

b. Erection or maintenance of buildings or other structures
c. Conveyance or disposition of property
d. Labor disputes
e. Acts of public officials
f. Miscellaneous

a. In General

Whether particular acts constitute a violation of an injunction depends on the language of the injunction decree, construed in the light of its purpose and the mischief it was designed to remedy. Observance of the letter of the decree will not suffice if by some subterfuge or scheme its spirit has been violated, and the place of violation or the means by which it is accomplished are immaterial.

An injunction is violated by performance of the acts prohibited thereby,[62] regardless of the means employed by the restrained party to accomplish the violation.[63] Whether or not particular acts constitute a violation of an injunction depends largely on its special provisions,[64] and the language of the decree or order should not be extended to cover acts not fairly and reasonably within its meaning.[65] In order to authorize punishment for a violation of an injunction the acts complained of must be clearly embraced within the restraining clause of the injunction,[66] and if it is doubtful whether the injunction has been violated the court is not justified in punishing for contempt.[67] A mere agreement between the parties enjoined and other persons to violate an injunctive order, without any overt act, has been held not to constitute contempt.[68]

While the party restrained must do something which constitutes a violation of the letter or spirit of the injunction,[69] injunction orders must be honestly and fairly obeyed,[70] and the violation of the spirit of an injunction, even though its strict letter may not have been disregarded, is a breach of the mandate of the court,[71] which will not allow its process to be disregarded or evaded on merely technical grounds.[72] No scheme or subterfuge, however artfully designed to disguise its real nature and purpose, will be allowed to succeed if it constitutes in effect a substantial violation of the injunction.[73] One who violates the letter of an injunction in reliance on his judgment that he does not violate its spirit acts at his peril,[74] for, as shown infra § 267, good faith or the absence of an intention to violate the injunction is generally considered no defense in a contempt proceeding. He cannot set up his opinion as to the meaning of the injunction against the court's opinion, and, if he has any doubt as to what he may do without violating the injunction, he should ask a modification of the injunction or a construction of its terms.[75]

In determining whether there has been a breach or violation of an injunction, the decree or order for the injunction is to be construed with reference to the nature of the proceeding and the purpose of the injunction,[76] as shown by the pleadings and the relief prayed for.[77] It is important to consider the objects for which relief was granted as well as the circumstances attending it.[78] In doubtful cases, an injunction order should not be so construed as to forbid the discussion of matters of public interest,[79] such as matters which vitally affect an industry on which the prosperity of a community, whether large or small, depends.[80]

Place of violation. The party enjoined is at no more liberty to violate the provisions of a binding injunction outside the jurisdiction of the court than within, as the contempt lies in the fact, not in the place, of the disobedience.[81]

Procuring or permitting violation by another. The obligation to obey an injunction cannot be avoided by procuring or permitting a third person to violate it.[82]

Construction of agreement. It has been held that, where an agreement between the parties to a suit for the entry of a consent decree for an injunction also contained provisions intended to modify the operation of the decree, and inconsistent with its terms, the court would not impose a fine for violation of the decree as for a civil contempt for the benefit of the other party, when such violation arose from a difference of opinion as to the construction of the agreement.[83]

b. Erection or Maintenance of Buildings or Other Structures

Violation of an injunction occurs by the erection or maintenance of buildings, walls, fences, or other structures contrary to the terms of the injunction decree; but an injunction against the erection of a new structure is not violated by repairing or occupying a structure already erected.

Adjudications have been made as to whether there has been a violation of injunctions relating to the erection or maintenance of buildings or other structures of a particular type or character,[84] such as injunctions prohibiting the erection or maintenance of a wall,[85] a spite fence,[86] structures interfering with the view of plaintiff's lot,[87] or buildings other than a residence or a required type thereof.[88] An injunction against "constructing" or "erecting" is not violated by repairing property constructed before the injunction was granted,[89] or by moving in and occupying a structure already erected.[90] An injunction against building on an alley is only technically violated by putting additional stories on a building formerly erected.[91] The location, opening, and improvement of a street to connect with a proposed bridge and passenger elevator are not in disregard of an order enjoining construction of the bridge and elevator.[92]

c. Conveyance or Disposition of Property

An injunction prohibiting conveyance or disposition of particular property may be violated by conversion or delivery of the property, an execution sale thereof, allowing another to take the property, and even by an offer to sell; nor can such an injunction be evaded by the subterfuge of collusive legal proceedings.

Adjudications have been made as to whether particular acts constituted a violation of injunctions prohibiting the conveyance or disposition of property,[93] and injunctions restraining such conveyance or disposition have been held violated by a conversion of the property,[94] a conveyance or transfer intended to confirm one made prior to the injunction,[95] delivery of property which was sold before the injunction issued,[96] voluntarily allowing the property to be taken by one having no right to take it,[97] and even, it has been held, by an offer or agreement to sell the property.[98] Such an injunction is violated by any active interference by defendant or his agents for the purpose of having the legal title transferred to another.[99] Where a person is enjoined from disposing of property, he will not be permitted to obtain a transfer by means of collusive proceedings at law.[1] An injunction against the sale of property by a trustee does not prevent his suing at law to recover the trust property.[2]

Execution sales. Where the enforcement of an order of sale or the collection of a judgment has been enjoined, a sale of the property under execution is a violation of the injunction;[3] and placing an execution in the hands of the sheriff constitutes a violation thereof, although no sale takes place under it.[4]

d. Labor Disputes

The general rules governing the determination of the acts deemed violative of an injunction, including the rule against procuring others to violate an injunction, have had frequent application to injunctions arising out of labor disputes, and in particular have been applied to injunctions prohibiting boycotts, picketing, coercion of employees or customers, and the obstruction or seizure of property.

In determining what does or does not constitute a breach or violation of an injunction issued prohibiting acts in the course of labor disputes, the general rules discussed supra subdivision a of this section have had frequent application.[5] Denunciation of the official action of a judge in granting an injunction in a labor dispute and the application to him personally of opprobrious and abusive epithets is a contempt of court.[6] One who urges others to violate an injunction issued in a labor dispute may thereby subject himself to punishment for contempt.[7] Where an injunction has been issued, mandatory in form, commanding employees to perform the duties for which they were employed, they may, without rendering themselves liable for contempt, avoid obedience to the injunction by actually ceasing to be employees,[8] but, if they continue in service and refuse to perform the duties incident thereto, they are punishable for contempt.[9]

Persuasion or coercion of employees or customers; picketing. Preventing employees or others, or inducing them to refrain, from working or accepting employment may constitute a breach or violation of an injunction prohibiting interference with business.[10] Procuring the discharge of members of a union from employment for refusal to join another union is in violation of an injunction against interference with the employment of such persons and punishable as a contempt.[11] It has been held that payment by strikers of money to employees of the company against which the strike is in operation to induce them to join the strike is not a violation of an injunction prohibiting "unlawful" persuasion and does not render them liable as for a contempt;[12] but it has also been held that payment of a consideration to an employee on condition that he refuse to go to work for plaintiff after having engaged so to do violates an injunction prohibiting the doing of any act which would in any manner tend to interfere with the running of plaintiff's business.[13] Imposing or threatening to impose injuries or penalties, such as fines or expulsion, on members of a labor organization for obeying an injunction may constitute a breach or violation of the injunction.[14]

An injunction against picketing is violated by distribution of handbills to customers and carrying a sign stating that complainant does business with another who is unfair to organized labor.[15] It has been held that while, in itself, there may be no harm in one person or even two or more, loitering or standing in the neighborhood of a factory or other place, nevertheless, this act, in itself, associated with the facts that there is a lockout or strike, that the men who loiter and patrol and picket are employees who have been discharged, that they are members of the union whose purpose it is to stop the operation of plaintiff's factories as far as they can, until the workers therein have been discharged, or have joined the union, violates an injunction against picketing plaintiff's factory or intimidating his employees.[16]

Picketing, even though peaceful, when it is intended to compel plaintiff to accede to the demands of a union and take back its members on terms dictated by the union, is in violation of an injunction prohibiting the doing of any act tending or intended to compel plaintiff to operate its factory, or employ or discharge workmen, in the manner or on the terms demanded by the union.[17] It has also been held that an officer of a union is in contempt of an injunction against picketing where, notwithstanding the injunction, he went to complainant's plant believing that the court had no authority to issue an injunction, and although he said nothing to the employees and made no disturbance.[18] Only persons who resort to, or who aid or assist in, the commission of acts of violence can be held in contempt for violating an injunction against unlawful picketing where the language of the injunction is limited to such acts.[19] An injunction obtained by an employer for the protection of his property and employees against violence is not violated by violence against property of a defendant;[20] nor is violence committed by an agent of the employer a violation of an injunction running only against labor union members, their agents, or confederates.[21]

An injunction restraining interference with employees by violence or threats is violated by assaulting one who took the place of a striker, even though such person had left the employment before the assault, since the effect of the assault would be to prevent others from taking employment.—Winkle v. U. S., C.C.A. Mo., 291 F. 493.

Newspaper articles

An injunction prohibiting individuals from jeering at or insulting employees was held limited in its scope to personal actions and interference and hence was not violated by an article in a newspaper characterizing strikebreakers generally in opprobrious terms.—Cohen v. U. S., C.C. A.Tenn., 295 F. 633.

Reference to employees as "traitors"

An injunction restraining union members from referring to employees as "scabs, or other offensive, scurrilous, or opprobrious names," has been held not violated by calling them "traitors."—Vulcan Detinning Co. v. St. Clair, 145 N.E. 657, 315 Ill. 40.

Display in shop window

One who at the request of strikers, displayed in the window of his barber shop, facing a street along which employees passed, going to and from their work, a placard bearing in large letters the words "No Scabs Wanted in Here," violated an order enjoining the strikers and "all persons conspiring or associated with them" from interfering with, annoying, or insulting employees of the company about the premises or on their way to or from their work.—Taliaferro v. Boycott. Acts that continue or tend to continue the maintenance of a boycott against which an injunction has been granted,[22] such as publishing and using letters, circulars, and other printed matter,[23] may constitute a breach or violation of the injunction. The calling of strikes against complainant's customers to prevent the use of materials manufactured by complainant may amount to threats, coercion, and intimidation within the meaning of an injunction against interfering with complainant's business by such means, even though no violence is used.[24]

Physical obstruction or seizure of property. If an injunction prohibits interference in any way with any person delivering or hauling plaintiff's product, the obstruction of a passageway leading to plaintiff's place of business, which prevents the passage in that direction of a vehicle sent out by plaintiff,[25] or the forcible stopping of a team to prevent its egress from plaintiff's factory,[26] is a violation thereof, rendering those participating in such acts punishable for contempt. Where members of a labor union combine and confederate together to seize the property of a company, in violation of a restraining order, they are punishable for contempt.[27]

Public officials restrained from proceeding with a specified contract or enforcing a designated ordinance do not violate the injunction by making a new contract or ordinance and proceeding thereunder, unless the new one is substantially identical with the old and constitutes a colorable evasion of the decree. In a great variety of cases the terms of particular injunctions against public officials have been held violated or not, depending on the language of the injunction and the surrounding facts and circumstances.

Public officials who have been restrained from proceeding under a particular contract on the ground that the contract is invalid cannot be held in contempt for entering into a new contract and proceeding thereunder, unless it is clear that the new contract is a mere colorable departure from the old;[28] and this result is not changed by the fact that the new contract may be illegal, where any illegality rests on a different ground from that which invalidated the old contract.[29] Such officials are guilty of contempt, however, if the new contract is in substance the same as the old, is subject to the same objection, and constitutes merely a colorable evasion of the court's decree.[30] Officials restrained from expending money under a construc-

An injunction against picketing and boycotting a nonunion store was violated by patrolling the streets adjacent to such store, displaying banners calling attention to the injunction, and requesting friends of organized labor to abide thereby, where the banners were of such character as to attract attention of persons in the vicinity of store and falsely to lead them to believe that a labor controversy existed between the proprietors of such store and their employees, and to work a boycott generally of such store.—Nusbaum v. Retail Clerks' International Protective Ass'n, 227 Ill.App. 206.

Notifying of union action

Where union members unanimously voted not to load or unload trucks of a particular employer, and it did not appear that officers of the union counseled the members to take such course or were in any way responsible for it, the union officers, by notifying other employers of the action taken by the members, were held not to have violated an injunction enjoining them from hindering the employer in the course of its business.—Henderson v. Coleman, 7 So.2d 117, 150 Fla. 185.

Calling attention to violations of union rules

A union agent was held not to have violated the terms of a restraining order by directing the attention of contractors to violations of the union rules.—In re Larkin, 142 A. 822, 103 N.J.Eq. 195.

Influencing contractor's choice of subcontractors

Labor union representatives were held not to have violated an order restraining them from inducing contractors to let no subcontracts to particular employers where such representatives attempted merely to compel a contractor to keep his promise to use subcontractors employing only union labor, and to compel him to terminate his agreement with one which did not employ union labor and which was not one of the particular parties mentioned in the injunction order.—In re Starrett, D.C.N.Y., 45 F.2d 399.

An injunction restraining a labor union, its officers, and members from coercing any person to refrain from dealing in the product of a certain mill, from interfering with work on buildings using such product, and from boycotting the manufacturer and the product, is violated by calling strikes on buildings using the product and not permitting workmen to return to work until union-made material is substituted for such product.—Anderson & Lind Mfg. tion contract, bids for which have been irregularly advertised for, do not violate the restraining order by canceling the contract, readvertising properly for bids, and entering into a new contract.[31] Where the enforcement of an ordinance has been enjoined on the ground that certain provisions of the ordinance are invalid, the passage and enforcement of a new ordinance on the same subject, without such invalid provisions, are not violations of the injunction;[32] but an attempt to evade the injunction by passing another ordinance similar to the one enjoined is a contempt.[33] A municipality and its officials who have been restrained from the operation of a public utility in an improper manner are not guilty of contempt because of mere errors in judgment or discretion in connection with their operation or management of the utility, but are guilty only in case of fraud, dishonesty, or abuse of discretion in their official activities.[34] An injunction restraining a city and its officers from making a certain grant is violated by a vote of the city council to make such grant.[35] Officials who have been restrained from interfering with another official in the performance of his duties do not violate the injunction by simply declining to consult with such other official or to ask him to perform any services.[36]

In addition to the foregoing, other adjudications have been made as to whether there has been a violation of injunctions prohibiting particular acts by public officials, or by individuals claiming to be public officials,[37] as, for example, injunctions prohibiting enforcement of a scale of rates for insurance companies[38] or public utilities,[39] redemption of bonds,[40] interference by an insurance commissioner with the business of an insurance broker,[41] enforcement of an order of county commissioners directing the improvement of a highway,[42] the taking or examination of bank records by a congressional investigating committee,[43] seizure of certain vending machines,[44] disobedience by a chief of police of orders issued by the superintendent of public safety,[45] and attempts by one claiming the right to hold a particular public office to exercise the acts or duties of the office.[46]

f. Miscellaneous

The general rules governing the determination of what acts constitute a violation of an injunction have been applied to injunctions pertaining to the maintenance of legal proceedings, engagement in or the practices of particular businesses or professions, and many miscellaneous matters.
